Shultz may quit post over deal for captives

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congressional leaders accused the Reagan administration Sunday of keeping them in the dark about reported White House deals to send arms to Iran, and some suggested its power to conduct such operations should be curbed.

The criticism came amid speculation that Secretary of State George Shultz, who also apparently knew little about the contacts that reportedly produced arms deliveries in return for hostage releases, could resign over the matter.

Shultz called an unusual meeting of State Department experts Sunday at his suburban Washington home, but officials said the session on Syrian-sponsored terrorism was unrelated to questions about Iran.

A New York Times report quoting Shultz aides raising the possibility of a Shultz resignation "is pure speculation, as the story itself says," spokeswoman Sondra McCarty said. "I am not going to have further comment."

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he had spoken to Shultz on Saturday. "In my judgment, he will not resign," Lugar told interviewers on ABC's "This Week with David Brinkley."

News reports last week said former National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane traveled to Tehran earlier this year and arranged to ship arms to Iran in exchange for the release of U.S. hostages kidnapped in Beirut.

An embargo on arms shipments to Iran, which is at war with Iraq, has been in effect since 1979. The official U.S. position on the war is neutrality.

If the press reports are true, said Senate Democratic Leader Robert Byrd, the arms trade was "a major blunder" that guarantees hostage-taking will continue and could tip the balance of power in the Middle East.

Aquino replies to rumors, promises to defend her rule

By The Associated Press

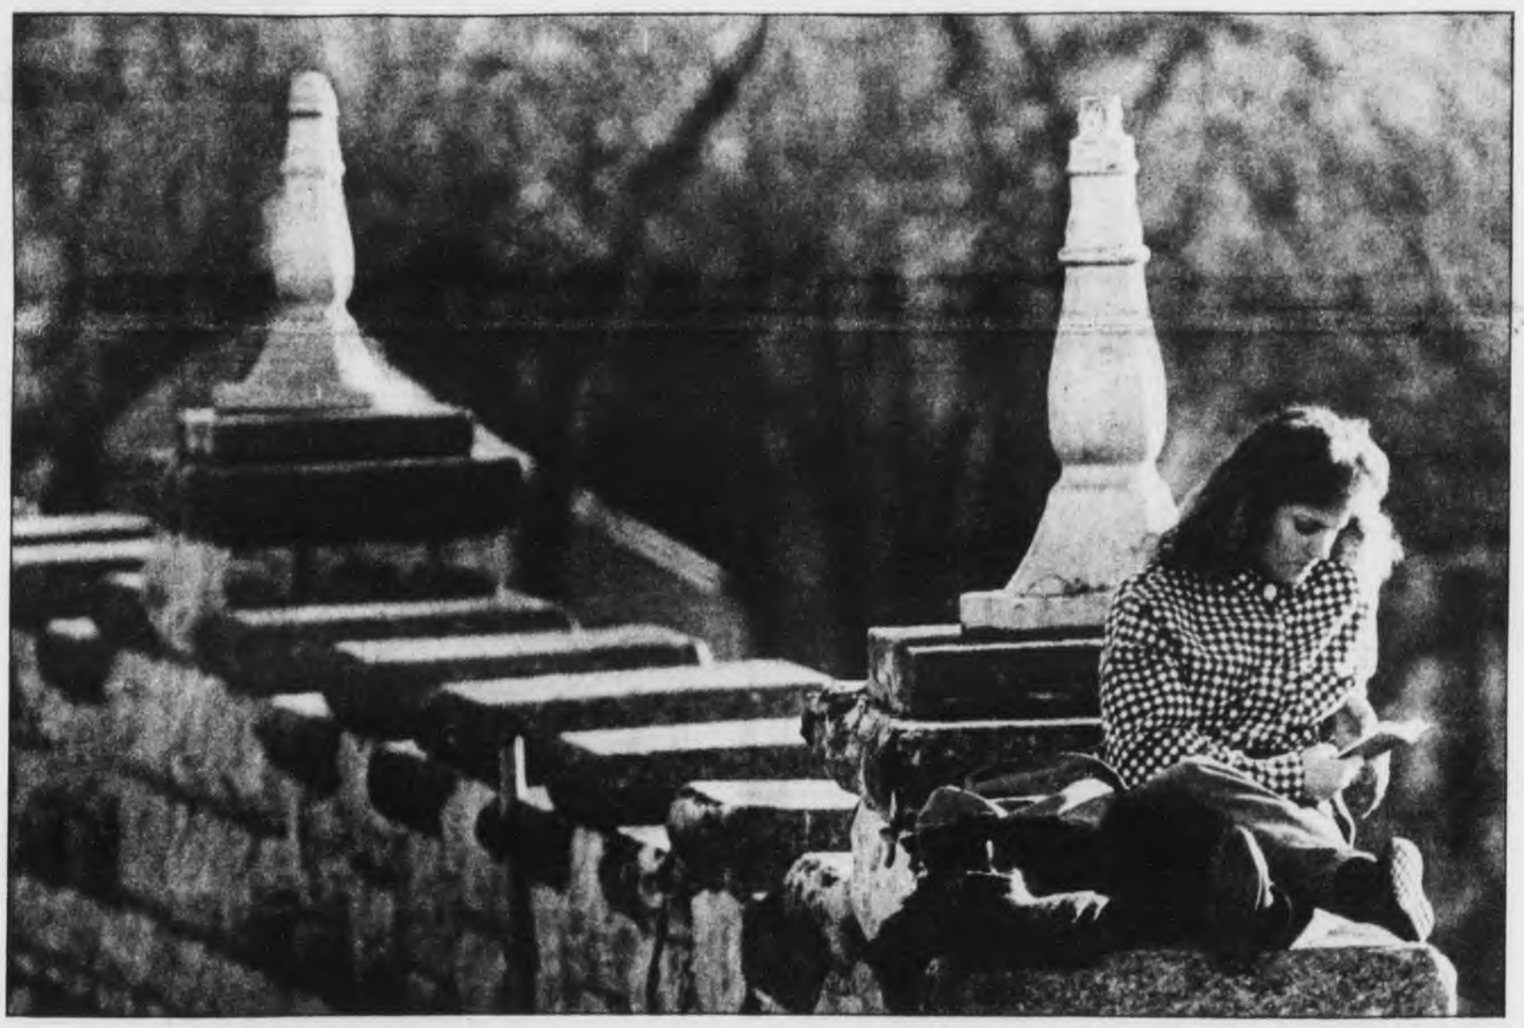
MANILA, Philippines — President Corazon Aquino warned "self-appointed messiahs" in the military on Sunday that she will call people into the streets if needed to defend her rule.

It was her strongest statement yet on persistent coup rumors and came during a televised speech on the eve of her four-day visit to Japan.

The president said she ordered the military to "repel any attacks against our units or centers of government as well as any threat to the security of our people" while she is gone.

Gen. Fidel V. Ramos, the chief of staff, put the military on maximum alert. Guards increased security at the Defense Ministry and at armed forces headquarters at suburban Camp Aguinaldo.

The Manila Chronicle newspaper meanwhile said a threat continued from officers linked to Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile who were disenchanted with Aquino's government and its peace policy toward communist rebels.



Bayan, an umbrella organization of labor, professional and other groups, on Sunday threatened a nationwide general strike if a coup occurs. Bayan claims 1 million members and led street protests against President Ferdinand E. Marcos before a military-civilian revolt ousted Marcos in February and he fled into Hawaiian exile.

At a downtown raly Sunday attended by about 15,000 government supporters, Aquino's brother-in-law, Agapito Aquino, called for diligence against any attempted takeover of state radio and television by the president's foes.

In her speech, at a dentists' convention, Aquino, 53, vowed to spare no means to defend "my contract with my people and my commitment to God."

She promised to prevent the Report condemns cuts in college financial aid

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A national commission headed by former Education Secretary Terrel H. Bell called Sunday for a massive effort to nearly double the number of college-educated adults by the turn of the century.

And the commission took a sharp slap at members of the Reagan administration and other politicians for "unthinkingly abetting an act of national suicide" by trying to cut aid for college students.

Bell's 22-member panel prepared the report for the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, which represents 372 four-year campuses that enroll 2.5 million students and award a third of all bachelor degrees.

It urged states to keep college tuitions as low as possible, in part to help recruit more minority students and stop the growth of "an American underclass."

"America has far too many people whose abilities are never awakened," declared the 22-member National Commission on the Role and Future of State Colleges and Universities in its 56-page report, "To Secure the Blessings of Liberty."

Bell was to address the association Monday at its annual meeting in Phoenix.

The commission included Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton and former Mississippi Gov. William Winter, as well as a half-dozen college presidents, the heads of both national teacher unions and the chancellor of New York City's schools.

The pungent language echoed "A Nation At Risk," the 1983 critique of U.S. schools by the National Commission on Excellence in Education, which Bell appointed. That report warned of a "rising tide of mediocrity" in the schools and likened their condition to "a unilateral act of disarmament." It spurred many states to raise graduation standards and boost school budgets.

Bell's new report said, "With a high school dropout rate ranging from 25 to 50 percent and with almost 10 percent of our total population functionally illiterate, who can deny that we have a massive population of undereducated people?"

"Public officials who propose budget reductions in education at a time when the republic is handicapped by the burden of an undereducated populace are unthinkingly abetting an act of national suicide," the Bell commission said. "Their priorities are wrong."

"Tragically for the American people, the federal student financial aid program today is on the chopping block in Washington," said the report, adding that the real value of federal aid has fallen 25 percent since President Reagan took office in 1981.

Reseacher studies heart's formation to understand disease

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

In an effort to understand the causes of heart disease, the nation's leading killer, recent research on campus is starting at the beginning — the formation of the heart.

The heart is the first organ to function in a living embryo, and it continues to become more and more complex as it pumps blood to the other developing organs. In humans, the heart begins to beat on the 23rd day after conception.

Brian Spooner, professor of biology, is conducting research on the early development of the heart that may lead to a better understanding of the heart and what causes its defects and failures.

"The better we understand heart tissue, the better we can understand the heart's abnormalities and can correct them," Spooner said.

Spooner uses chicken embryos in his research because of the similarities of the chicken's beginning heart development and the development of a mammalian heart.

The early events in the formation of a beating chicken heart are identical to those of a human embryo, Spooner said.

The amount of elapsed time to development is also a factor in using chicken embryos, he said. Since the chicken's gestation period is only 21 days, Spooner can incubate the egg for one day and in 24 hours can extract from the embryo the developing heart and study it under a microscope.

Two other reasons for using the chicken embryo are that eggs can be obtained in large quantities, and the embryos can be obtained without any damage to the mother. The use of an experimental mammal such as a mouse, would require killing the mother in order to extract the embryo, he said.

Most other heart research starts with a heart that already has differentiation. The heart is already developed beyond the changes that distinguish the cardiac cells from the other cells in the body. Spooner's work deals with gene activity that makes some cells different from others in order to discover how a cell becomes a heart muscle cell.

Describing the development of a heart, Spooner said two plates of cells migrate toward each other and form two endocardial tubes. These tubes are vertical as they join together to form one large tube. When the tubes fuse, the heart begins to beat.

At this point in development, Spooner compared the heart to the construction of a house that is being built from the inside out. The walls of a house are put up then the floors, walls and doors are put in place before more outside construction is done. The heart resembles this process because as the outside walls of the heart are constricting, four separate chambers are being built that will result in two ventricles and two atriums with corresponding passageways between them.

"We study the very early stages of development by studying tiny bits of tissue," Spooner said.

Spooner uses only pre-cardial cells

Manhattan activities to commemorate U.S. war veterans

By The Collegian Staff

Once each year Americans set aside a day to honor all the men lucky enough to have returned home from a foreign war.

Tuesday, Veteran's Day, will provide opportunities for Manhattan and other area residents to participate in remembrances of U.S. military personnel.

KQLA-FM, in association with the Kansas Vietnam Memorial, is sponsoring Combat Boot Day. Beginning at 11 a.m., Vietnam veterans attired in fatigues and combat boots will assume posts on Manhattan, Junction City and Ogden street corners. The veterans will be accepting donations dropped into empty combat boots to go toward the Kansas Vietnam Memorial, said Ed Klimek of KQLA.

The veterans will be posted at local locations to accept donations until 5:30 p.m.

The memorial, which will be a smaller replica of the one in Washington, will display Kansas veterans' names. It is to be built in Junction City at the City Park, with dedication set for July 4, 1987.

Local Post 1786 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, will have a flag-raising ceremony at 7 a.m. Tuesday to commemorate veterans who fought for the country.

The Manhattan Pearce-Keller Post 17 of the American Legion will have a "victory party" Tuesday evening in recognition of the individuals who donated to the 1986 fund-raising campaign to rebuild and remodel the post home. A Veteran's Day Remem-

University cadets from both the Army and Air Force ROTCs will be participating in campus Veterans' Day ceremonies Tuesday.

Terry Heyns, professor of aerospace studies, said there are two facets to the ceremonies. In the morning, a ceremony to honor veterans who died in past wars will take place, and in the afternoon, a retreat will honor all veterans.

At 7 a.m., the cadets will assemble to place wreaths simultaneously on the three memorials on campus that honor veterans who died in past wars.

The first memorial, in the Military Science Building, honors veterans of World War I; the second, in Danforth Chapel, recognizes veterans who died in World War II and the third, in the Union, honors veterans who died in Vietnam.

At 5 p.m., the Army and Air Force ROTC cadets will meet again for a joint retreat on the front lawn of Anderson Hall.

The retreat is scheduled to begin with

Leader says revolution to continue

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, Iran's ailing, 86-year-old spiritual leader, said Sunday his death would not end the country's Islamic revolution. He apparently was trying to defuse a power struggle within the clergy-led regime.

"Our enemies must understand that the Islamic Republic ... has been stabilized and is not dependent on any person, but on the people and the armed forces," Khomeini said in a speech to military men at his residence in Jamaran, north of Tehran.

The speech was carried by Tehran radio and was monitored in Nicosia.

Widespread reports said Khomeini, who had a heart attack in 1980, recently suffered one or two more attacks. Rumors that he is in declining health are common, but this time people in power seem to be taking the reports seriously.

They come at a time when academic, diplomatic and business sources say a struggle for survival is under way in Iran's leadership, nearly eight years after uprisings inspired by Khomeini ended the reign of the late Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

Ministers consider Syrian sanctions

LONDON — Western European foreign ministers meet in London today to consider for a second time in two weeks Britain's demands for joint measures against Syria for its alleged support of terrorism.

West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and French Prime Minister Jacques Chirac said after conferring Sunday in Oggersheim, West Germany, that they expect the 12-nation Common Market to agree on sanctions against Syria at the meeting.

A British official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the government was "quite optimistic" that a four-point package will be adopted by all nations of the Common Market.

The four proposals on today's agenda are a ban on arms sales to Syria, the indefinite suspension of visits to Syria by high-level Common Market officials, stepped-up surveillance of Syrian embassies in market countries, and tightened security arrangements in connection with operations of Syrian Arab Airlines.

Activists sabotage whaling boats

REYKJAVIK, Iceland — Saboteurs opened the bottom valves on two Icelandic whaling boats early Sunday, sinking the vessels in Reykjavik harbor, police reported.

The U.S.-based Sea Shepherd Conservation Society claimed responsibility for the attacks. Sea Shepherd leader Paul Watson, in an interview broadcast on Icelandic state radio and television, said a team from his organization based in Los Angeles sank the boats because, "The Icelanders were hunting whales illegally."

No injuries were reported in the attacks, which were believed to have occurred about 2 a.m. when no crew members were aboard. A guard on a nearby boat told police that at about 5 a.m. he noticed the two vessels taking on water but he was unable to save them.

Iceland agreed to abide by an International Whaling Commission decision to cease whaling from 1986 until 1990. Although its commercial whaling stopped, the government permits the Hvalur Whaling Co. to carry out what is called scientific whaling in cooperation with the National Oceanic Research Institute.

Democrats may cut aid to Contras

WASHINGTON — The Democrats' Senate victory has undercut President Reagan's congressional support for aiding Nicaraguan Contra rebels, but the party re-alignment does not necessarily mean future assistance is doomed, according to analysts on both sides of the debate.

The analysts also agree that Reagan's weakened position could make Contra aid one of the most closely fought issues in the 100th Congress and potentially an important battleground in the 1988 presidential race.

Last Tuesday's elections ushered in a 10-vote Democratic majority in the U.S. Senate, but that shift does not translate into as big a change on the Contra aid issue because voting did not follow strict party lines.

According to tallies by both Republicans and Democrats, the new Senate breakdown on Contra aid is virtually even, assuming senators continue to vote as they did earlier or follow positions they took during their campaigns.

World Series sparks racial conflict

AMHERST, Mass. — Ever since the Red Sox lost the World Series, black and hispanic students say life in this small college town 100 miles from Boston's Fenway Park has become a nightmare.

A fight in Amherst between white Red Sox fans and black boosters of the New York Mets injured a bystander after the final game of the series and unearthed racial tensions at the University of Massachusetts here that spread to nearby colleges in the Connecticut River Valley.

A racial slur was painted on the steps of Smith College a week after the World Series. Rumors floated that a white student in a Ku Klux Klan outfit at a Halloween party won a prize for the costume. Black women complained of stepped-up harassment.

"There's a sense of vulnerability and terror, of a state of siege on the part of minorities," said John Grayson, an assistant professor of religion at Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley.

Closed bank pays customer debts

ENID, Okla. — The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. began issuing checks Sunday for insured depositors of the First National Bank&Trust Co. of Enid, which was closed by federal regulators last week.

The doors opened at 1 p.m. for depositors with holdings under the federally insured $100,000 to receive their checks, said Pat McCarthy, FDIC supervisor at the bank.

Despite advance publicity in media outlets throughout the northwestern Oklahoma community of 50,000 people, "business has been very light," McCarthy said. "I'm afraid everybody may be waiting until the crowds die out, and they're all going to show up at the same time."

McCarthy said no estimate of those who received checks would be available until Monday morning.

He said that due to weather forecasts of temperatures falling into the 20s, strong northerly winds and a chance for snow, officials and merchants had arranged to provide a shuttle bus service for depositors to travel from the bank to the city's convention center to receive their checks.

KU students organize concert to support children of Vietnam veterans

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

Despite a change in location, a 6:30 p.m. Tuesday concert to benefit children of Vietnam veterans is scheduled to go on at Memorial Hall, Kansas City, Kan.

The concert, to feature John Fogerty, George Thorogood and The Delaware Destroyers, Stephen Stills, David Crosby and Michael Finnegan, was originally scheduled for Allen Field House in Lawrence.

The Veteran's Day concert is the brainchild of Craig Krueger and a group of University of Kansas students calling themselves Youth for Vietnam Veterans, said Robert Arensberg, one of the organizers.

The funds raised will go into a scholarship fund for children of Vietnam veterans who were killed, disabled, prisoners of war or declared missing-in-action, Arensberg said. The fund will be administered by the Paralyzed Veterans of America, based in Washington, D.C.

Organizers of the event have estimated that after expenses, the concert will raise $50,000 for the scholarship fund.

Planning an event like this, no matter how noble the cause, involves numerous obstacles, Arensberg said. The concert has been postponed twice and now moved.

"It took 14½ months of doors being slammed in our faces and people telling us we couldn't do it," Krueger said. "We went through agents, lawyers, girlfriends, relatives and anyone we could find (to contact the bands) — and it payed off."

"It is rare that a group, any group, much less a group of college students will band together to attempt an enormous undertaking such as this," said Mike Delaney, associate director of development for Paralyzed Veterans of Amercia.

"We want to show that the 'me generation' is mislabeled," Krueger said. "We want to stress that young people care.

"We want a peaceful world, and the best way to have peaceful world is through understanding," he said. "And the best way to show understanding is through scholarship and education.

"We expect to be sold out."

As of Sunday night, general admission tickets were still available at all CATS outlets or by calling 913-576-7676.

The concert has been endorsed by President Ronald Reagan, Kansas Gov. John Carlin, Nebraska Gov. Robert Kerrey, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., and many others, he said.

Actor Peter Fonda is scheduled to also appear at the concert, Krueger said, adding that other performers are also expected to make surprise appearances.

Attitude discourages women in sciences

By CARLENE KAISER
Collegian Reporter

Women working for a degree in the sciences are earning better grades than their male counterparts, but researchers are finding that women change their major more often.

Gail Shroyer, graduate teaching assistant in Curriculum and Instruction and former science teacher, said there are many reasons why women do not go into sciences.

"When women aren't in the science classes, it's a detriment on all areas of that field," Shroyer said during a presentation to Friday's Focus on Women.

From the time girls are in grade school, they are encouraged by parents and teachers to not go into science-related occupations, she said.

"Boys should not be innately different than girls in what they can learn," she said. "There's some controversy over boys having more spatial abilities than girls."

Spatial ability is the ability to manipulate a pattern in the mind and conceptualize it, Shroyer said. This ability is not distinguished in children until puberty and she said she believes the reason for the change is that boys have the chance to develop their abilities more by playing with such things as Tinker Toys and Lego's.

A British study, titled "Girls in Science" found most girls have problems on tests because most tests are masculine-biased. In the areas that were neutral in gender interests, girls scored as well as the boys.

Shroyer said girls may want to see science as how it relates to people (as in the field of nursing) while boys look at it separately.

Other factors that might be keeping girls out of science may be role models, stereotypes, lack of involvement in science in the classroom, teacher expectations and general lack of knowledge about the opportunities in the field, Shroyer said.

Girls should also have the opportunity to do more problem solving in the science classrooms.

Making science more relevant and applicable to the life of all students as well as educating parents and teachers to opportunities in the field for females, may help break the cycle of not having women in science, Shroyer said.

Traffic problems hinder new Wal-Mart

By The Collegian Staff

Plans for construction of a second Manhattan Wal-Mart store, to be located on the west side of the city near Seth Child's and Shuss roads are still on hold.

"(Wal-Mart) started plans in August '85, and (the project) is still on hold," said Manhattan attorney Joe Knopp, who has been retained as the local legal representative for the corporation.

"If it does not happen fairly soon we will have to lose interest and start (looking) at some other sights," he said.

One of the main obstacles in continuing the project is whether Seth Child's Road will be expanded to a four-lane highway.

"Seth Child needs to expand to avoid congestion with all the turning and stopping going to the store," Knopp said.

One major problem with widening Seth Child's Road is in finding funding for the project. Due to the road serving as a state highway, K-18, the city is exploring the possibility of obtaining some funds from the state.

In a story from The Associated Press, the Kansas Department of Transportation announced the postponement or deferral of several projects throughout the state, including the city of Manhattan. The reason cited for the action was the failure of Congress to reauthorize its highway construction program.

Although the funding issue has not been settled, the city has approved preliminary road plans.

"The road plans are just in the design stage," said Larry Hulse, chief city planner for Manhattan. "We have not asked for bids yet from construction companies. We are only in the beginning stage."

Hulse said the local firm of B G Consultants, 206 Southwind Place, is working on the road design.

U.S. should support ending Meese's term

The American Civil Liberties Union has begun a campaign to convince President Reagan to remove U.S. Attorney General Edwin Meese from office.

In a letter to U.S. citizens, ACLU Executive Director Ira Glasser writes, "Though appointed to the post of Attorney General for the express propose of upholding the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, Mr. Meese has instead both failed to enforce the laws of the United States and used the power of the Federal government to take away established constitutional freedoms."

The ACLU should be chastised for their efforts — not for taking such serious action, but for not acting sooner! The only party to be chastised more harshly is the American people who have offered virtually no resistance to Meese's attacks on their personal liberties.

In a recent case, Meese argued that the Constitution does not prevent the government from giving direct financial aid to religion. He has also supported efforts to amend the Constitution to allow teacher-led prayer sessions in public schools — a blatant violation of First Amendment restrictions on separation of church and state.

Meese has weakened and sought to abolish the "exclusionary rule," which protects citizens from unlawful search and seizure by making it constitutionally unlawful to object to illegally gathered evidence. He has also urged the Supreme Court to abolish the "Miranda rule," which requires that individuals be informed of their rights prior to questioning.

As if that weren't enough, Meese opposed the Voting Rights Act of 1982 which outlawed intentional discrimination.

As the chief law enforcement official in the United States, Ed Meese has undermined the very laws that make this country free. As American citizens who support a free society, we should support the ACLU's efforts to keep America free.

Donations of organs may save friend's life

Using organ donations is one of the greatest wonders of science. Imagine being able to help one person with something another person cannot use.

Unfortunately, people are not giving. A survey done by a University psychology research team found that only 10 percent to 13 percent of University students have signed organ donation consent cards.

It does not take more than a few minutes to sign the organ donation form on the back of a driver's license. The only information needed is your signature, the date, the organs you are willing to donate and two witnesses' signatures. So why don't people do it?

The survey found one reason is that people believe a doctor would declare a premature death to take an organ. However, the doctors in charge of the transplants are not in charge of the emergency case. Any personal bias would not enter a decision.

Disfigurement of the body is another reason given to not donate organs, yet doctors can remove even eyes without leaving outward marks.

Another reason for not signing donor cards was people's aversion to thinking about death. Face it, you are dying from the moment you are born. If your injuries are fatal, you could help someone else live longer by donating organs.

Do something unselfish and sign an organ donation consent form. Someone else's unselfish act may save your life or someone you care about, and your unselfish action can return the favor.

Writer says 'thanks' for comments

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

To those who have responded to my latest columns, thank you.

For a while I thought I was a failure. When I began this latest foray into editorial journalism, I believed my comparatively extreme views would cause a flurry of letters to pour into the letters basket on my editor's desk. This didn't happen. I wanted a real debate to break out to allow everyone the chance to analyze the different views and make up their minds instead of the usual mindless acceptance of media news.

After this anticipated flurry failed to materialize, I began to search for reasons why no one was responding. The most unlikely possibility was that everyone agreed with what I said. The only other reason has to do with the intellectually fatal disease called apathy. But after many attempts to draw them out of ignorance, I judged the patients to be terminal.

Just as I was about to throw away my books and become a fluff writer, I was saved from the dingy pit of silly topics. Criticism! I had actually managed to make people mad enough to write a letter, successfully luring them out of their fatal state of apathy.

Of course, this has only been a partial success. I would hardly call this response a "flurry," but my editor is happy with the material. She likes a good argument just as much as I do. Also, the responses so far have been loaded with emotion, but lack reason. But, a few irrational letters are better than none. So I must make do and get on with the original purpose of this column, which is to answer these criticisms directed at your humble narrator.

The first attack I would like to address comes from Wendall Sexton's letter, "Irresponsible writing," in Friday's Collegian. His charge that I lack "professionalism" is not the kind of rational criticism I was expecting. He states there were "multitudes of mistakes" in my last column about the totalitarian and imperialistic nature of religious fundamentalism. But the only mistake he points out is when I called the Bible an "ancient book." Here, the mistake is his. The Bible is an ancient book, just as Plato's "Republic" is an ancient book. They are both "very old" — Webster's definition of "ancient." Maybe Sexton should get a dictionary before he tries to attack a journalist's professionalism.

Another problem Sexton saw with my column was its use of opinions to attack religion and politics without the facts to back them up. Where are these factless opinions? Why did you fail to mention any? If you would let me know where they are I would be happy to correct them. In the meantime, he should follow his own advice. The letter was loaded with opinion, yet it lacked the facts to back the accusations.

Another letter, "Newspaper half-truths," in Friday's Collegian criticized my column about President Reagan's lies. The author, Rande Repp, accuses me and this newspaper of spewing out biased, one-sided half-truths.

As before, this letter makes accusations without much proof. Is Repp trying to say the president doesn't lie? If he is, he provides no facts to back his claim. If he does have facts, I wish he would let us know what they are. I would like to believe the man I voted for in 1984 is not a habitual liar. But when he tells Israeli Prime Minister Yitzak Shamir that he personally assisted in the liberation of the Nazi death camps when in fact he was in Hollywood making movies, I begin to wonder just what am I supposed to believe.

Maybe Repp believes it is all right for a president to lie to the people. He does bring up the example of the Lybia disinformation campaign, even though I never mentioned that lie because it falls into a different category. The lies I talked about were directed at the American people, not a foreign government.

Reagan has intentionally misled the public on many occasions. Sure, he was elected twice by the people, the same people he's been lying to for all these years. Some of the lies I quoted were from campaign speeches made before his first election. As long as the people keep believing his lies, they will keep supporting him. After all, two-term presidents are not exempt from lying. Richard Nixon was elected twice, but his fog of deception cleared away before he was able to finish his second term.

It is a fact that Reagan lies. There is no excuse for misleading the American public. Without honesty in government, democracy withers and dies. This is an unbiased fact. If you think I am biased because I criticize the president for being Republican, think again. If you can name someone so obviously deceitful and dangerous as Ronald Reagan, I would be happy to include him on my 10 most hated list, somewhere between Rep. Jack Kemp, R-N.Y., and Democrat Lyndon LaRouche.

If you defend the president's lies, you are defending something other than the system of government envisioned by our founding fathers. Our government cannot survive the war of deceit being waged by the man in Teflon armor. In the words of a fellow columnist, "the founding fathers would puke" if they saw what Reagan has done to this country.

All media should be carefully scrutinized by everyone. Don't accept what you see and hear as the truth until you see the facts. Question all sources, from the president all the way down to your humble narrator. Watch for those baseless accusers, for they are the ones concealing the smoking guns while pointing at innocent people.

Keep the letters coming and keep me honest by pointing out mistakes if I make them. I really need the input; without it, I will be doomed to a life of fluff writing.

University Christmas list for Santa

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

Though this may be the least of your worries right now, do you realize that there are only 46 shopping days left before Christmas? There are just 46 more days to drop big, though subtle, hints to family and friends on what you'd like to find under the tree Christmas morning. You have a mere 46 days to shower them with extravagant, yet cheap gifts, and have just enough loose change left to make it home for the holidays.

Fourty-six more days until Christmas also means only 40 more days until finals are over. Now that's important news — it gives you something to live for.

While you spend the next few days making a Christmas list, hoping nobody wonders if you deserve anything, give some thought to what the University needs this year. Don't fill it with the obvious "wants" — a winning team in any sport, a reputation for being the best in the nation in anything besides postgame disorderly conduct, and a 75 percent cut in tuition effective Jan. 1. The "needs" of the campus are equally, if not more important, and more attainable than the "fairy tale endings and pipe dreams" mentioned above.

What K-State really needs is:

A taller administration — not only the "head honchos," but the faculty at large, including the head coaches. Is it any wonder enrollment is decreasing at such an alarming rate? Prospective students are searching for a university and administration that are "head and shoulders above the rest" and, unfortunately, they are "overlooking" it here, by a collective 15 or 16 inches at least. An alarming trend is firmly establishing itself at K-State. Our last University president was barely tall enough on his tip-toes to ride the roller coasters at Worlds of Fun.

Kansas is known for its wheat, its "set your watches back 100 years" lifestyle, and its big, strapping farmboys. We need University leaders who stand tall and exemplify those traditions (the first and last ones, anyway).

The issue of height, or lack thereof, can be remedied. Think of how many times you see the president speaking without a podium. It's a rare occurrence. A stepstool from Santa hidden behind the lectern could work wonders. Trick photography would be a "must" at any event without a podium, or perhaps seating for the crowd in nearby low-lying areas, i.e., valleys or craters.

To further digress from the "Christmas list" idea, let me say, for current K-Staters, height isn't really that important. Leadership is what counts. The quality of that leadership — and we do seem to have potential here — will be firmly established after the first significant snowfall. Good leaders call off class on "snow days," and are subsequently idolized by students and have buildings named after them before they die. That's something for the president and other policy makers to keep in mind.

What this campus really needs for Christmas is amnesia regarding the Fred Bramlage Coliseum. Wouldn't it be great if everyone forgot about it? A new coliseum will ruin everything. Who will need to camp out for basketball tickets when the stands will be half empty (or half full, as the coliseum supporters would see it)? The only good to come from the big, fancy coliseum would be the more appealing Landon lecturers we might attract — speakers who would appeal to everybody. Noted sex therapist Dr. Ruth would be sure to pack in the crowds from miles around.

Athletic Director Larry Travis would certainly appreciate a new sports program in his stocking Christmas morning. The football team is going nowhere, and the future of the basketball team remains to be seen.

How about changing to other lesser known, but nonetheless crowd-pleasing sports? Let's pick some sports nobody else in the Big Eight has even thought of yet. Then we'll have the competitive edge and added experience on the rest of the competition when they realize what a great idea we've got.

Collegiate all-star wrestling would bring in the crowds. Surely the mentality, or lack thereof, of some students here would ensure a large tryout for the team.

We already have an established rugby team, so why not put our athletic support behind them and move the games to the stadium. People would come from miles around, over and over again, and still leave wondering what the object of the game was. Leave them confused, and they'll come back for more.

If the Fred Bramlage Coliseum does become a reality, how about bringing back the chariot races? The greeks have been doing it for years, and with their help, we wouldn't need horses.

To improve the campus grounds, all we really want for Christmas is more parking spaces and fewer "going for the most points" drivers (as in hitting or scaring the daylights out of pedestrians).

The parking situation can be remedied in one of two ways. Either give all the available spots to seniors and graduate students (you have to earn those suckers), or resort to more aggressive law enforcement of parking. Shoot to kill, or at least maim, those parked illegally.

Reckless drivers can only be handled the easy, yet gutsy way. Let them hit you, then sue them for all they're worth, thus making the rest of their slimy lives miserable. Santa, we'll need your help in obtaining some of the best lawyers in the country who can win the biggest claims (you know, the ones that advertise on cable TV).

We've barely skimmed the surface of K-State's needs and wants this holiday season. Let's hope Santa has been reading along. This just may prove to be his biggest challenge yet.

Facts support Christian faith

MATT JACKSON
Guest Columnist

Re: Kirk Caraway's column, "Bible fundamentalists imperialistic" in the Nov. 3 Collegian.

In writing his article, Caraway said many incorrect things about Christianity that cannot be left unchallenged.

Caraway mentioned that the Bible says all we need to do is to put our faith in Jesus and our problems will disappear. This is untrue, and any person who advocates this kind of doctrine is not right.

The Bible promises that Christians will deal with problems like everyone else. In 2 Timothy 3:12, it states, "And indeed, all who desire to live godly in Christ Jesus will be persecuted."

Jesus even said that we must deny ourselves daily and be prepared to sacrifice everything to follow him. But the advantage is that as Christians we have an intimate relationship with God, the biggest problem solver in the universe.

It was also mentioned that the Bible is just "some ancient book." A close look at the Bible's credentials will prove it is anything but that.

It is by far the most heavily documented book known to man. There are more than 24,000 manuscripts supporting the authenticity and accuracy of the Bible. Some of these dealing with the New Testament date back to 80 years after the final Biblical writings.

The second, third and fourth most heavily documented writings are those of Sophocles, Aristotle and Caesar, respectively. Together their supporting documents number barely more than 250, with an average time span between the date of writing to the earliest document being more than 1,300 years. (Source: Henry Oursler, master's degrees from Reformed Theological Seminary and International School of Theology.)

Archeology also supports the Bible. Nelson Glueck, a well-known Jewish archeologist, wrote, "It may be stated categorically that no archeological discovery has ever controverted a biblical reference." William Foxwell Albright, who has the reputation as one of the greatest archeologists, said, "There can be no doubt that archeology has confirmed the substantial historicity of Old Testament tradition."

Caraway asked for a rational argument against abortion, homosexuality, drugs and casual sex. All we must do is examine the results of these acts. Anyone even vaguely associated with these things knows of the guilt, diseases, and ruined families and lives that accompany these acts. It seems strange to me that we as humans have to find out the hard way why God warns us against doing certain things.

If you want to attack Christianity, don't start with its leaders. Fortunately, we as Christians follow Jesus Christ and not every leader who comes along professing Christianity. Instead, try attacking the resurrection of Jesus. By this incredible act of power, all of Christendom stands. Many people in the last 2,000 years have tried to prove Jesus never rose from the dead, but have never adequately given an answer to the question of "what happened to the body of Jesus Christ?" The fact that Jesus proved he was God by defeating death has had a greater impact on our planet than any other single event in history.

Even if Falwell or Robertson became president, I wouldn't worry too much about our country becoming totalitarian or imperialistic. Fortunately, most people who have had a beginning political science class know that our country's system of checks and balances would never allow this to happen. That aside, perfect laws do not create a perfect society; perfect people create a perfect society. And only through the changed lives brought about by the love of Jesus can we even contemplate a perfect society.

In general, Kirk Caraway implies that the Bible is "a pre-determined set of rules that offer no rationale for their existence." But all one must do is read the Bible and it will become clear that it is a love letter. It is a story of God's incredible and undeniable commitment to mankind. This love drove Jesus to pay the price for our sins on the cross so that we may know God without having to earn his love. And this love has personally changed my life. I now have security, a new life, a personal relationship with God and the assurance of eternal life with him that did not exist before I placed my faith in him. In addition, God has given us credibility to support his love through the historical proof of the resurrection of Jesus Christ and through the uniqueness of the Bible.

I, too, want to close with the same challenge Kirk Caraway gives: "We are independent, thinking beings, not mere machines. Open your eyes and think for yourselves. Follow logic and not blind faith." Then the love of God will become quite obvious.

Matt Jackson is a senior in business education.

Letter

Right-of-way

Editor,

Being both a driver of a vehicle to campus as well as a pedestrian crossing a major street from a parking area to campus, I believe I have an unbiased exposure to the driver/pedestrian conflict.

The fault of the conflict does not lie within a singular group, but rather a misunderstanding of right-of-ways by both groups. When a pedestrian enters or is within steps of entering an unsignaled crosswalk, it is the driver's responsibility to stop and give the pedestrian the right-of-way to cross the street. However, if there is no crosswalk (signaled or otherwise), drivers have the right-of-way and pedestrians attempting to cross in front of an oncoming vehicle should get across before the vehicle is upon them or they are obstructing traffic.

We have a vicious circle of driver/pedestrian conflicts because pedestrians cross whenever, wherever and at what speed (some fools saunter) suits themselves. Therefore, drivers ignore the crosswalk right-of-way, and pedestrians feel no need to use them and cross wherever they desire.

If people cannot grow up, be aware and observe each others' rights, then people should be humiliated in such a fashion as pedestrians being treated as if they were grade-schoolers by being escorted across the street by crossing guards and drivers penalized by being required to drive 20 mph on streets bordering campus.

Bingo appeals to mixed crowds; players are 'oh so serious'

By MAUREEN MURPHY
Collegian Reporter

The word "Bingo" usually conjures up the image of a group of elderly people sitting in the basement of a church on Wednesday evening.

However, that stereotype is passe. Bingo has universal appeal, and those who play it are oh so serious.

"It used to be nothing but older people, but everybody is getting into it now," said Tommy Kluber, bingo chairman for the Manhattan chapter of the Knights of Columbus, a Catholic men's organization.

The game is no longer played for pure enjoyment or as a fun way to pass the time. Bingo players today are serious about the game and are out to win a share of the bingo pots, Kluber said, some of which are significant.

"Bingo people can be the oddest people," he said. "Most of the players are very, very serious. If you make a mistake, you hear about it.

"Everything has got to be perfect to help the crowd."

The Knights of Columbus has sponsored bingo games for 27 years, Kluber said, and he has been the bingo chairman ever since the local organization started the games. He said he tried to quit once but was persuaded to return.

The Knights of Columbus hall, which is located off Highway 18, conducts the bingo games from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. every Sunday. The Knights of Columbus chose Sunday as their bingo night because, Kluber said, it was the best night for people to come.

Each player pays $1 for each card or may purchase six cards for $5. Most bingo players play six cards at a time, but many of the "regulars" play 12 cards. Twenty-five games are played during the course of the evening, five of which are warm-ups.

The amount of money in each pot depends on the size of the crowd, he said. About 120 people usually pack the hall each Sunday night, and the money prizes are $15 for regular games, $25 for special games and $99 to $200 for the jackpot games.

The regular and special games are vertical, horizontal or diagonal bingo. Blackout bingo, where players must cover every square, is played for the jackpot. There are usually three jackpot games, but the number varies depending on the size of the crowd. Forty-eight to 51 numbers are called before an individual calls "blackout," Kluber said.

"A lot of players never win, even in a year's time, yet others have won a couple of times," he said. "They say they are never coming back, but they always do."

Most of the bingo players are regulars, but there are usually a few newcomers each week. The bingo players come from surrounding towns, not just from Manhattan, he said.

Kluber said most of the players are single. Recently, he said, he's seen many young married women playing bingo, and the number of college-age players is increasing. Not many families frequent the bingo hall, partly because the Knights of Columbus doesn't allow anyone under the age of 13 in without special permission.

Profits from the bingo games are used first to pay the bills to keep the hall running. Any remaining funds are given to various charities or families that need help, he said.

Many other organizations, including the Elks Lodge and American Legion, sponsor bingo games in Manhattan. For those who are avid bingo players, Kluber said, it is possible to play bingo each night of the week.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

As a number is called, Colleen Hagler of Junction City marks one of her 15 bingo cards. Hagler is one of about 120 weekly bingo players who attend bingo night at the Knights of Columbus hall outside of Manhattan. Twenty-five games are played each Sunday night.

BEWARE of other Steamboat Packages!

SEVEN REASONS WHY YOU SHOULD GO TO STEAMBOAT WITH UPC TRAVEL:

1. Due to many requests, we have ALTERED our trip to include the "drive your own" option only. This will drop our trip price $59. We will also hold a car-pooling meeting so you can arrange your transportation needs and save yourself some money.
2. You will know ABSOLUTELY where you will be staying. Kutuk Condominiums are located 22 yards from the lift and sleep six per condo. You won't be crowded into a room with 7-9 others.
3. We have NO HIDDEN COSTS! You need ski equipment to ski! If you don't own your own, the trip cost is higher.
4. We have a 30 YEAR REPUTATION of running great trips for K-State students.
5. A STAFF sponsor from the K-State Union will be on-site in Steamboat. You'll always know what's going on. You won't have to count on just a travel agent rep who has NUMEROUS other schools and groups to take care of.
6. We accept Mastercard and Visa.
7. Our package is better than the others. We started working last summer on Steamboat to make certain all of the DETAILS were properly addressed. We are concerned with trip participant needs. We are not here to make a profit.

DON'T BE FOOLED BY THE OTHERS! WE'LL PLAY STRAIGHT WITH YOU!
NEW LOW PRICES: $225.00- without ski equipment rental & no transportation.

KC declines apologies during 27-7 home win

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A dejected Bill Kenney tried to apologize after throwing two interceptions to the Seattle Seahawks with his first four passes. But his Kansas City teammates would not let him.

And then, bolstered by the confidence they were showing in the veteran quarterback, Kenney went out and threw three touchdown passes to lead Kansas City to a 27-7 victory over Seattle Sunday and give the Chiefs their best 10-game record in 15 years.

"I threw two bad passes. They were all my fault," Kenney said. The Chiefs also fumbled Seattle's first punt, but the defense refused to let Seattle cash in the turnovers. And by the middle of the second quarter, the momentum had shifted solidly in favor of the Chiefs.

"I knew it was my fault that we were in a hole like that and I went to the sidelines and said, 'I'm sorry, fellas, I blew it,'" Kenney said.

"You're always telling us that we're a team, that we win and lose as a team," guard Mark Adickes told him. "We know you can get the job done."

A knot of red-shirted Chiefs yelled their agreement.

"When they said that, and when I saw that the defense had held them to no points despite the three turnovers, then I just had a feeling it was going to be our day," Kenney said.

The Seahawks got only 14 total yards and a missed field goal from the three turnovers as the Chiefs raised their record to 7-3, their best 10-game mark since a 7-2-1 start in 1971 led to their last playoff appearance.

The Seahawks managed only 133 net yards.

"We didn't have any offense at all today," said Seahawks Coach Chuck Knox. "We were emotionally ready to play. We got a turnover right off the bat, but we gave it right back to them. I thought we would play better than this."

The Seahawks, 23-17 winners over Kansas City in September, lost for the fourth time in five games and dropped to 5-5. Seattle had only 36 net yards in the first half and veteran quarterback Dave Krieg, replaced the week before by Gale Gilbert, started the second half. Gilbert played the fourth quarter.

Kenney tossed a 3-yard scoring pass to tight end Walt Arnold early in the second period, then moved the Chiefs 51 yards in 11 plays to set up Nick Lowery's 35-yard field goal.

Stephone Paige hauled in an 8-yard scoring pass from Kenney with one minute remaining in the first half to cap a 72-play drive and give Kansas City a 17-0 halftime lead. Carlos Carson snared a 25-yard scoring pass in the third period and Lowery added a 37-yarder in the fourth.

Steve Largent caught a 38-yard touchdown pass from Gilbert that was deflected off the hands of Daryl Turner late in the fourth period.

Kenny Easley opened the game by intercepting Kenney and returning the ball 10 yards to the Kansas City 31. But the Chiefs regained possession on the next play on Curt Warner's fumble.

Moments later, Dave Brown intercepted a poorly thrown Kenney pass and put the Seahawks in business on their own 35.

Collegiate bowl committees bid for championship game

By The Associated Press

If No. 1-ranked Miami and No. 2 Penn State remain unbeaten, they will stage a national championship shootout in either the Fiesta, Florida Citrus or Gator Bowls.

Miami would like to play in the state of Florida for the home-field advantage. Penn State's preference apparently is the Fiesta Bowl at Tempe, Ariz.

Since The Associated Press adopted the practice of voting for the national champion after the bowl games in 1968, only twice have two major independent teams gone through the regular season unbeaten and untied.

It happened in 1973 when third-ranked Notre Dame was 10-0 and No. 6 Penn State 11-0. Notre Dame won the national championship by defeating top-ranked Alabama 24-23 in the Sugar Bowl, while Penn State beat Louisiana State 16-9 in the Orange Bowl.

In 1976, top-rated Pittsburgh and No. 17 Rutgers were 11-0. Pitt wound up on top by defeating Georgia 27-3 in the Sugar Bowl, but Rutgers remained unbeaten, untied, uninvited and unelected, finishing No. 17.

Miami and Penn State are 9-0 after the Hurricanes downed Pitt 37-10 and the Nittany Lions edged Maryland 17-15 Saturday. Their national championship showdown still is alive.

Miami has home games against Tulsa on Nov. 15 and East Carolina on Nov. 27. Penn State visits Notre Dame next Saturday and plays Pitt at home Nov. 22, the official bowl selection date.

The Fiesta, Florida Citrus and Gator bowls had representatives with Miami and Penn State on Saturday and all three claimed they will be competitive money-wise with the Orange, Sugar and Cotton Bowls, which have conference tie-ups and can't invite both Miami and Penn State.

"If all things were equal, we definitely would like to play in the Orange Bowl," Miami Athletic Director Sam Jankovich said. "That's our community, that's where our fans would be and it would be a very good thing for our program."

But the Orange Bowl host team is the Big Eight champion, so Miami and Penn State must look elsewhere.

Don Meyers, chairman of the Tempe, Ariz.-based Fiesta Bowl's selection committee, said Penn State "has expressed a preference to play on a neutral field outside of Florida, and the only one that's really available to them is the Fiesta Bowl."

However, Jankovich, said, "I don't think Penn State can call the shot where the game is going to be played. We'll work at it together and see where it goes. I think that we would be in a position, if we're undefeated, that we could play a significant role where we're going to play it."

Money will not be a problem for the Fiesta, Citrus and Gator Bowls, all of which say they can match the approximate $2.5 million each team could expect from the Orange, Sugar and Cotton Bowls. The Rose Bowl is a closed corporation involving the Big Ten and Pacific-10 Conferences.

K-State wins statistical battle but OSU, Dykes prevail 23-3

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

The difference in Saturday's 23-3 Oklahoma State win over K-State can be summed up with the mention of one name: Hart Lee Dykes.

K-State Coach Stan Parrish said Thursday stopping Dykes and tailback Thurman Thomas would be essential for the Wildcats to have a chance against the favored Cowboys.

And after K-State defensive back Erick Harper delivered a spectacular, sweeping undercut hit on Thomas early in the second quarter, the 1985 All-American was out of the game with a knee injury.

Containing Dykes, a 6-foot-4, 206-pound wide receiver with superior athletic ability and blazing speed, proved to be a far more difficult mission. Time and time again, Dykes came up with the big play for OSU as he caught seven passes for 121 yards and two touchdowns.

Both of Dykes' touchdowns came on loft passes from quarterback Mike Gundy on plays designed to isolate Dykes on 5-foot-9 'Cat cornerback Craig Christlieb and set up the obvious mismatch. On both plays Christlieb had Dykes adequately covered, but both times Dykes used his height and leaping ability to come down with the ball in the end zone.

"I thought I had good position both times," Christlieb said. "But it's rough. He's the best receiver in the Big Eight. There maybe are quicker ones, but none with his size."

"It's like one of us in this room guarding (Kareem Abdul) Jabbar," Parrish told reporters, comparing Dykes to the 7-foot-2 Los Angeles Lakers center. "If I were Dykes, I'd do the same thing. I'd get matched up on the smallest guy on the field."

After his performance Saturday, Dykes was truly an athlete worthy of comparison to the great ones.

"I told Hart Lee after the game, I compare him to one guy that I have seen live on the field as an opposing coach and that's Al Toon who is with the New York Jets and who was with Wisconsin then (when Parrish was an assistant coach for Purdue in 1983)," Parrish said. "He's big, tall, graceful and he has good speed and good hands. He has a chance to be a fantastic player if he isn't one already."

And while Dykes proved to be the dominating factor in the game, two sequences of events in the second quarter sealed K-State's fate.

'It was frustrating because we really moved the ball away from the scoring zone about as well as we have all year.'

— Stan Parrish

The first came when the Wildcats failed to capitalize on momentum and field possession gained after Harper's hit put Thomas out of the game and caused a fumble that K-State recovered on the Cowboys' 42.

On second down, Williams hit running back Todd Moody with a pass on the Oklahoma State 10 that would have given the Wildcats, trailing the Cowboys 7-3 at the time, a golden opportunity to put more points on the board. However, the play was called back by a holding penalty. A 5-yard procedure penalty followed on the next play and after two incomplete passes, K-State was forced to punt. So much for that opportunity.

The big blow came with 1:10 left in the second when a low snap by K-State's Chad Faulkner led to an ill-fated attempt to run out of trouble by punter Troy Faunce. Faunce's run ended just short of the line of scrimmage, the K-State 32.

"I was going to try to kick it, but as I released the ball, I saw I couldn't," Faunce said. "The snap was a little low, and I felt my best chance was to the left side. I thought I could get it off my left foot, but there were too many guys around."

After defensive tackle Jeff Hurd came up with two big plays — a hit for loss on reserve tailback Mitch Nash and a batted-down pass — Dykes went to work again.

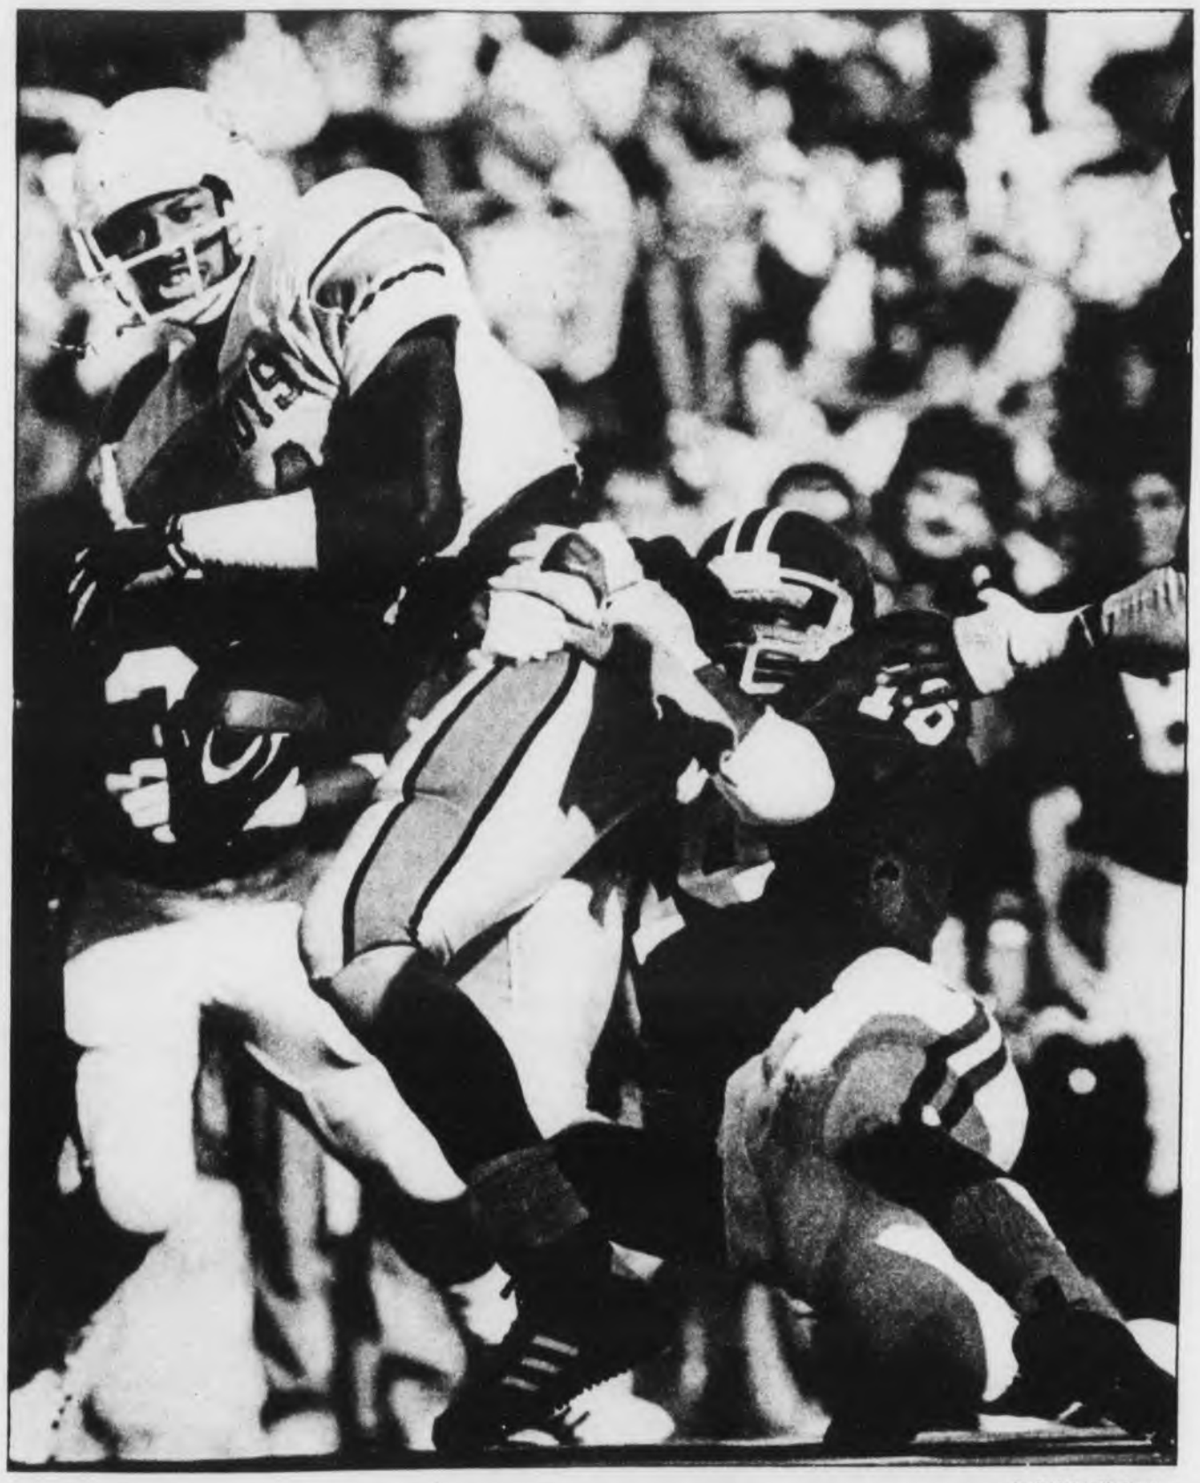
First Dykes hauled in a Gundy pass on the 11-yard line. Then came the most controversial play of the game and the one that probably did in the Wildcats for good — a high touchdown strike from Gundy to Dykes on the very edge of the end zone with 42 seconds left to play.

First, field judge Terry Turlington signaled the pass as incomplete, then reversed the decision to give Oklahoma State a 14-3 lead.

"It was man-to-man coverage. I was supposed to get release, then Mike threw it up and I got it," Dykes said. "I knew I had one foot in bounds, but I didn't know about the other."

According to college rules, one foot is all Dykes needed.

Most mystifying to Parrish was the glance he took after the game at the statistics sheet where K-State led in most every statistical area except the final score.



"It was frustrating because we really moved the ball away from the scoring zone about as well as we have all year," he said. "...It would be different if we were outplayed or outcoached. I thought we had a good plan — a lot of diversity to our plan."

K-State (2-7 overall, 1-4 in the Big Eight Conference) travels to Ames, Iowa, next week to meet Iowa State (5-4, 2-3).

Iowa State led early Saturday against Nebraska, but the 'Huskers regrouped to win 35-14.

Wildcat running back Todd Moody, who was knocked unconscious on a hit by Cowboy defensive back Mark Moore midway through the fourth quarter, will be OK according to Parrish. Moody spent Saturday night at

Top-three seeding chances vanish after 'Cats fall to Sooners, ORU

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

K-State's women's volleyball team has been eliminated from earning one of the top three seeds in the Big Eight Conference postseason tournament after losing two matches Friday and Saturday.

The 'Cats lost a hard-fought match to OU Friday night in Norman, 16-14, 8-15, 15-10, 15-11 and lost Saturday to Oral Roberts University in four games, 15-8, 13-15, 15-13, 15-12.

"It seemed like it was a continuation from one match to another. We were giving up too many easy points and making to too many unforced errors to both teams. The unforced errors let the momentum slip back to our opponents," Coach Scott Nelson said.

"We had (our opponents) down early in almost every match, but we took the pressure off. When we didn't apply this pressure, we weren't playing to win, but we were playing not to lose," he added.

"...When it got down to the end of the match, OU would raise their level of play and enthusiasm," Nelson said. "It was reverse pressure on us, and this was when we gave up the quick points and the most unforced errors."

Most of the matches against the Sooners were close, according to the 'Cat coach, but the Wildcats did not show poise that was needed to carry them on to victory.

"Statistically on paper, we were close all weekend and we were competing with the teams. In the OU match, we hit over 25 percent as a team, which is pretty good. But it was also as a team that we had the little breakdowns that hurt us," Nelson said.

When an opportunity was created, Nelson said, K-State did not seem to take advantage of it.

"When we would get a non-attack return, we could not make the transition which would turn those into kills," he said.

Nelson said K-State did have some positive individual performances.

"Shawnee Call played an outstanding match against OU as did Valerie Kastens and Tami Tibbets. Valerie and Shawnee played very well in both matches that really helped our attacking effort," Nelson said.

Mary Mignano came off the bench to set extremely well against Oral Roberts, especially in the third and fourth game when she was the sole setter, he added.

The Sooners had outstanding performances from Trenell Carter and Kerri Mulry. Carter had 14 kills and 7 blocks with a hitting efficiency of more than 60 percent, with Mulry close behind with 12 kills and 2 blocks.

K-State will conclude its regular season Nov. 12 against the Missouri Tigers in Columbia. The 'Cats will head into the conference finale with an overall record of 8-17 and 2-5 in Big Eight action.

Referee's call blemishes 'Cats' first-half defensive execution

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

A late second-quarter controversial call wreaked havoc with the Wildcats' sparkling first-half defensive effort as K-State entered the halftime locker room down 14-3 instead of a much more legitimate indication of the first 30 minutes of play — 7-3.

With 42 seconds left on the KSU Stadium scoreboard, Oklahoma State's freshman quarterback Mike Gundy lofted a ball into the far-side corner of the end zone from the K-State 11-yard line. Hart Lee Dykes, the nation's most highly recruited player two years ago out of Texas' Bay City High School, ran under it and leaped up for the catch as K-State corner back Craig Christlieb ran stride for stride in defense.

The 6-foot-4 Dykes came down with the ball but was lying on his back outside the end zone stripe while field judge Terry Turlington signaled "no good." Turlington, however, after a moment of confusion, reversed his call and raised both his hands high above his head to signal a touchdown.

"I anticipated he was going to go out of bounds when he was in the air," Turlington said after the game's conclusion. "When he came down though, he was in. It was a mechanical officiating mistake. I was wrong, but I got it right in the end."

K-State coach Stan Parrish, who has had enough controversial calls go against his club this season to last a lifetime, argued the call vehemently along with defensive coordinator Jerry Hartman.

"The official said he thought he was in," Parrish said. "He made a 'no good' sign and then he changed his mind and said it was good.

"I thought (Dykes) pushed off but I'm not going to get into that again (disputing offical's calls)," he said.

Dykes, who had scored the game's first touchdown on a similar play in the first quarter against the 5-foot-9 Christlieb, told reporters he believed he had one foot in bounds — all that is necessary according to college rules.

"I think I had one foot in (bounds) when I fell," Dykes said. "I didn't think I wasn't in — never. I couldn't see why there was all the commotion. I didn't see the call because I was on my back."

The other half of the freshman-to-sophomore tandem, Gundy, said he didn't see the call either.

"I can't see if he was in bounds or not," said Gundy, who in in quarterback terms is a short 5-foot-11. "I saw the signal he was out of bounds so I started looking over to the sideline for another play and then they reversed the call."

Christlieb said he believed the only point of contention was whether or not he pushed Dykes out of bounds — not if he landed in bounds with the pass.

"I think they called the second TD good because I pushed him out," Christlieb said. "I thought I had good position on him both times. He's got the height on me, you have to jump as high as you can and hope you get a piece of the ball. He's the best receiver in the Big Eight in my opinion."

Phi Wacka Jackas earn second trip to national tournament

By MELISSA RANSON
and JOHN EVANS
Collegian Reporters

It was a challenge of champions this weekend when K-State's All-University flag football championship team, Phi Wacka Jacka, pounded the Fort Riley Garrison team 77-6.

The two teams battled it out at the University's intramurals field Saturday morning. Steve Martini, assistant director of Recreational Services, arranged the flag-football game between the two teams as part of "Fort Riley Day" at K-State.

Though the competition was friendly between the teams, Phi Wacka Jacka defeated its opponent by a wide margin.

"We were the better team," said Steve Ballard, senior in industrial engineering. "Though, they may have had a little bit of a disadvantage because we used our (K-State's) rules."

K-State's intramural program allows the offense to throw two passes per play, which is different from the standard one pass per play, said Mike May, senior in business administration.

"With our rules, we are allowed to throw passes anywhere behind or beyond the scrimmage line," he said. "When we realized they played by the standard rules, we tried to play a one-pass game, but we beat them anyway."

Phi Wacka Jacka will go to Fort Riley in two weeks for a practice match to help prepare for the National Intramural championship Dec. 27-Jan. 1 in New Orleans. About 72 intramural championship teams will participate in the tourney, Ballard said.

This will be the second consecutive year Phi Wacka Jacka has gone to nationals.

"We plan on winning this year," said Sam Weems, senior in recreation.

To enhance its chances of winning, the team plans on practicing two or three nights a week starting after Thanksgiving break. Athletic Director Larry Travis gave the team permission to practice in the Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

'This could be the last year of the team unless some of our friends pick it up.'
— Steve Ballard

Winners of the tournament will receive a trophy, a ride in the Sugar Bowl parade of champions, a Sugar Bowl hat and other individual awards. Also the winners and runners-up play an exhibition game in the Superdome on Sugar Bowl day.

Phi Wacka Jacka, an independent atheletic team, has dominated various intramural sports for the past three years.

In football, the team has captured two straight All-University titles and placed second three years ago. The team also placed second in co-recreational football this year.

In basketball, Phi Wacka Jacka has garnered All-University honors for the last two years in the six foot and over category and placed second last year in the six foot and under category.

And team members said they accomplish these feats without much practice.

"We never practice in basketball," Weems said.

"We scrimmage in football once a week on average," Ballard said.

The reason for Phi Wacka Jacka's success lies in quality — instead of quantity.

"In scrimmaging frat teams, guys in houses let more people who aren't as good as others play and we have more good guys who play all the time," Weems said.

In the three years of its existence, the team has shown losing isn't one of its attributes as Phi Wacka Jacka has compiled a 78-6 overall record:

— 26-1 in football.
— 10-2 the last two years in co-recreational football.
— 19-1 in two years of competition is the six foot and over division.
— 10-0 last year in the six foot and under division.
— 6-1 in team handball.
— 7-1 in softball.

The team even captured the putt-putt tournament with little difficulty as they won by 46 strokes.

Weems, Ballard and Greg Mealy, a senior in mechanical engineering, are the core of Phi Wacka Jacka.

"We're the ones who got things together but this could be the last year of the team unless some of our friends pick it up," Ballard said.

Joe Montana's return excites 49ers' offense

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Joe Montana was back, and so was the spark in the San Francisco 49ers' offense.

"It boosted my spirits having him in there again," said Jerry Rice, who played the top supporting role in Montana's spectacular comeback performance Sunday.

Montana hit Rice on three long touchdown passes and totaled 270 yards passing, leading the 49ers to a 43-17 blowout victory over the St. Louis Cardinals.

"Having Montana back got the fans and everyone else excited. He's the reason the 49ers have had a lot of success," Cardinals Coach Gene Stallings said.

Montana returned to action 55 days after undergoing back surgery, and he said he came out of the game "with no soreness, no pain and no stiffness."

He was driven to the turf several times by pass rushers, two of whom drew personal fouls for roughing the passer.

"I got hit hard enough, at times, to test me," Montana said.

"I don't think he took any real hard shot," said St. Louis nose tackle David Galloway, who registered the only sack of Montana.

"If the doctors let him play, he must be healthy. But, to come back so fast, he must really love the game," he added. "He did a great job. He's a great quarterback."

The Montana-directed offense also got a season-high 164 yards rushing, 64 over the team average. Joe Cribbs had a 105-yard day as the 49ers rebounded from a 23-10 loss to New Orleans last weekend.

The 43 points also was a season high.

"Joe Montana played beautifully, as did most of our players," Coach Bill Walsh said.

Colorado nearly falls to Jayhawks; Oklahoma demolishes Tigers, 77-0

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It sounds silly for a team that only a few weeks ago was 0-4, but Colorado may have been looking ahead.

That would be one explanation for why the Buffaloes almost blew a chance to play in the Orange Bowl. Favored by 24 points, Colorado escaped with a 17-10 verdict at home Saturday against the Kansas Jayhawks.

Oklahoma, in the meantime was slaughtering Missouri by a record 77-0 count. The fourth-ranked Sooners and the unranked Buffs, each 5-0 in the Big Eight, will meet next week in Boulder.

If Colorado beats Oklahoma the Buffs will need only to beat K-State in the regular season finale to take the title. Oklahoma concludes its reguar season at Nebraska.

"We have Oklahoma next week and some of our guys probably thought this would be a cakewalk over them (Kansas) and we could go on to next week," Colorado quarterback Mark Hatcher said. "You saw what happened."

Nebraska still lurks in the shadow however. The injury-weakened Huskers rallied from a 14-7 halftime deficit to beat Iowa State 35-14 and stay one game behind the leaders at 4-1.

Colorado jumped to a 17-0 lead, but Kansas, 0-5 in the Big Eight, fought back.

"It was a tough game to play," said Colorado Coach Bill McCartney, and we are glad to get away with the win."

Colorado seems to be catching Oklahoma when the Sooners are on a murderous tear. Their 64-3 drubbing of Kansas the week before was the second worst defeat in Jayhawk history. But Barry Switzer's troops did even better against the Tigers, who never suffered a worse loss.

The Sooners scored touchdowns on their first eight possessions and did not seem proud.

"It's just not fun for our guys," said All-America linebacker Brian Bosworth. "We don't want to go out and destroy a team like that."

It was but a scant three years ago when Missouri upset Oklahoma in Columbia, 10-0. Since then the Sooners have outscored Missouri 177-13.

"I wouldn't wish it on any journalist in the world," Missouri Coach Woody Widenhofer said. "It was a real lesson in humility. When you keep getting punched in the mouth, it gets real tough. The real test is whether we can get the football team back up to play the last two games."

Oklahoma Coach Barry Switzer, who lost to Missouri in 1981 and 1983, played just about everybody in the program.

"That's terrrible for them to be in that kind of shape," Switzer said. It's going to take a lot of good recruiting years to get that back."

In Ames, Iowa, it took Nebraska until the second half to get control of a pesky Iowa State.

"We didn't take Iowa State lightly coming into this game. We just didn't play with as much as intensity as we should have in the first half," Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne said.

"I feel really bad for my players," Iowa State Coach Jim Criner said.

Ag Council sponsors high school careers day

By JIM BLAKE
Collegian Reporter

As part of Parents' Day Saturday, Ag Council sponsored Ag Careers Day for high school juniors, seniors and transfer students.

About 210 students from 40 high schools participated in the event, giving them an opportunity to visit two departments of their choice.

"We've had a pretty good turnout," said David Oswalt, freshman in agricultural economics and assistant Ag Day coordinator.

"The ag ambassadors will follow up registration cards by telephoning prospective students," he said. "We'll try to encourage them to come back and look at the campus. This is an orientation with K-State and the ag program."

Activities included a general session in Union Forum Hall from 9 to 10 a.m., with a welcome from University President Jon Wefald.

Also speaking were Walter Woods, dean of agriculture, and David Mugler, associate dean for the College of Agriculture.

Campus and department tours were provided to inform the participants of various programs available and facilities used at the University.

Participants in Ag Careers Day were also provided with a lunch prepared by the Block and Bridle club and a complimentary football ticket to the K-State-Oklahoma State game.

While the students were attending department tours, an agribusiness panel discussion was held for counselors, advisers and teachers.

The panel members were Phil Kirk, sophomore in agricultural economics and coordinator for Ag Careers Day; Jim Akin, associate director for career planning and placement; Charles Sargent, assistant field director for Kansas Farm Bureau; and John Riley, associate professor in agricultural economics.

The panel discussed economic and occupational changes in agriculture during the past few years and ways to better prepare agriculture students for secondary education and employment.

"We have to make sure our programs are strong and people we turn out are successful," Riley said during the discussion.

"The session was more for counselors. We're trying to see where we are going in ag," he said.

"We're trying to show them how to get students prepared for college," Kirk said. "We're giving them the basic information on career opportunities and outlook."

K-State selects 1986 honorary parents

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Honorary Parents for 1986, Ken and Barbara Peirce of Hutchinson, represented one of three generations of K-Staters Saturday on Parents' Day.

Barbara Peirce said she was excited that her children nominated them for the honor.

"We feel honored because of the many outstanding parents who also were considered," she said.

The Peirces were nominated by their daughter, Kathy, junior in psychology, who submitted an essay in the campuswide contest. Her older brother, Ken, senior in social sciences, also attends K-State. Her younger brother, Kevin, is a junior at Hutchinson High School.

In her winning essay, Kathy Peirce said her parents have attended football games for years and have seen many parents honored on Parents' Day.

"They have come to Manhattan for many University events and have been supportive of my brother and me as well," Kathy Peirce said. "Through my current activities (as a varsity cheerleader), I am fortunate enough to show my enthusiasm for K-State which was instilled by my parents.

"They have so much pride in this University. What could be greater than to look into the stands at every game and have two of the proudest people in the world smiling back at me?" she said.

The Peirces were honored guests at a reception and Parents' Weekend banquet. They also sat in the president's box at the K-State-Oklahoma State football game and were presented a plaque from University President Jon Wefald at halftime.

The couple, who attended K-State in the late fifties, were legacies to the University themselves.

Ken Peirce's parents, Walter and Frances (Covey) Peirce of rural Hutchinson, earned degrees from K-State in 1928 and 1931 respectively. Walter Peirce was the national president of the KSU Alumni Association in 1956-57, and a conference room in Throckmorton Hall has been named in his honor.

Barbara Peirce's parents, Bill and Margaret Huff of Manhattan, worked for 20 years as accountants in the budget and University facilities departments in Anderson Hall.

"Both our parents set examples for us," Ken Peirce said. "They believe in what K-State stands for and so do we. Having children there also heightened our interest."

Ken Peirce earned a bachelor's degree at K-State in 1961 and is currently a partner in the law firm of Reynolds, Peirce, Forker, Suter, O'Neal and Myers. Barbara Peirce received her bachelor's degree in 1960 and is a history instructor at Hutchinson Community College. Both received undergraduate degrees in political science.

The Peirces have contributed to their community for 22 years. Ken Peirce serves as president-elect of the Chamber of Commerce and is choir director for Northminster Presbyterian Church. Barbara Peirce has established the Dillon Lecture Series, modeled after K-State's Landon Lecture Series, at Hutchinson Community College.

The Peirces also support the University through their efforts to organize alumni, participate in fundraisers and support K-State athletics. Ken Peirce has served 10 years on the KSU Foundation board of trustees. Barbara Peirce is a member of the University's Political Science Advisory Board, and is a Symposium member of the Department of History.

K-State Honorary Parents are selected each year based on essays submitted by students. Students must demonstrate their parents' involvement with K-State, their community and their encouragement for higher learning.

This year's Parents' Weekend theme, "From Roots to Wings," came from the quote, "Good parents give their children two things: one is roots, the other is wings." This theme was also to be incorporated in the essays.

Ad students to enter national competition

By BARRY STEFFEN
Collegian Reporter

University advertising students will have the opportunity to participate in the American Advertising Federation's 1987 National Student Advertising Case Competition sponsored by the Chevrolet Division of General Motors Corp.

Students will be asked to design a comprehensive advertising campaign that includes research, media selection, budget, creative solutions and campaign rationalizations for Chevrolet's Cavalier automobile.

"The goal of the whole competition is to provide students with a very realistic advertising problem to solve," said R. Charles Pearce, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

Pearce said because of the decrease in gasoline prices the small car market has also declined and many people are reverting to larger cars.

To combat the decline Chevrolet wants to market the Cavalier towards the 18- to 25-year-old audience.

Pearce received information on the competition earlier this semester but does not plan to have students begin work on it until the spring 1987 semester.

Pearce said a huge effort goes into the project including a 20-minute oral presentation and the fact that all advertising must be done in finished rough format.

The same kind of advertising format that an advertising agency operates under when competing for a company's business is used.

Fifteen district competitions will take place this spring and will be judged by regional advertising professionals. The winner of each district will advance to the finals in conjunction with the AAF's June 1987 national convention in Orlando, Fla.

"Many professionals are surprised and delighted to see the quality of work coming out of universities these days," Pearce said.

K-State will attend a district competition in St. Joseph, Mo. Schools from Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri and Iowa will be participating.

Pearce said K-State has not participated in the competition in two or three years and colleges and universities which compete must have an AAF chapter.

destruction of the armed forces by "a few misguided elements" and said a soldier's duty was to "fight the enemies of government and not fight the very government it is ordained to serve."

"If it should be necessary, I shall once more ask you to take to the streets," she said, alluding to the popular revolt that overthrew Marcos.

Coup rumors grew last week with publication in Business Day newspaper of a reported plan, codenamed "God Save The Queen," to take over the government, dump "inept and left-leaning" ministers and keep Aquino as a figurehead.

"These rumors, fueled by a few self-appointed messiahs, are an insult to the integrity of the majority of the new armed forces of the Philippines," Aquino said in her speech. "I shall oppose any attempt from any quarter to dictate to my government."

Philippine newspapers credited Ramos with heading off the coup.

But The Manila Chronicle said the threat would persist until Aquino takes a tougher stand against the communists and fires several ministers.

Coup rumors followed warnings to reporters by some officers linked to Enrile of an upcoming psychological warfare campaign to pressure the government and test Aquino's resolve.

It was unclear if the rumors signaled actual plans for a takeover or were just pressure tactics.

Efforts to contact Enrile for comment on Aquino's speech were unsuccessful.

Dole, R-Kan., told a conference in Atlanta Sunday that it would be a "terrible mistake" to cut an arms deal with Iran. "We all want the hostages home," he said, "but I don't think we want to deal with (Ayatollah Ruhollah) Khomeini in an effort to do that."

But other Republicans defended the reported administration activities, saying it is desirable to improve relations with Iran and attempt to moderate its extremism.

"The wider goal here is to try to bring about a more moderate group of leadership in Iran. ...We've made some strides in that regard," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, appearing on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, appearing with Lugar, said improving relations with Iran in general is desirable. But he added: "When it degenerated or when it developed into an arms trade for hostages, I have the gravest doubt...

"To negotiate for hostages makes it more likely that other hostages are going to be taken. To trade arms in a war in which a victory of Iran is against our national interest is unwise," Kissinger said.

Lugar said he had discussed the administration's activities at length with National Security Adviser John Poindexter, but in his television appearance he did not disclose details of those activities.

But Byrd, who is expected to be Senate majority leader next year, told interviewers on NBC's "Meet the Press" that he had repeatedly requested a briefing without success. And other Democrats, including Sen. Sam Nunn, Sen. Patrick Leahy and Rep. Richard Gephardt, said they still had not received any information.

"It would appear the White House is trying to do a back door way to get away from any congressional oversight," Leahy, D-Vt., said on "Face the Nation."

in his research. He extracts these cells from the embryo and disposes of the rest.

The cells can grow in a petri dish and Spooner can see what conditions are necessary for a heart to develop. Some of the conditions needed are proper temperature and humidity.

A special plastic petri dish and the proper medium are also needed for development. This medium is made up of a mixture of amino acids, glucose and serum. Spooner can add or detract from these conditions to see how the tissue responds in different situations and then compare his findings to other cases.

"We can change the medium and add drugs to target the effects of the agent on development," Spooner said, "and compare it to a heart that didn't get that agent."

The entire process of development takes about 24 to 30 hours in the chicken embryo. Spooner said he has had one heart muscle cell beat for two weeks in a petri dish.

The major part of the research is to discover how a cell becomes a heart muscle cell and why the heart beats. Spooner said the cells do not begin to beat until a collection of contractual proteins make up a contractual apparatus.

"Somehow, DNA is turned on and produces proteins that are organized into the contractual apparatus," Spooner said.

Spooner wants to find the genes that are the switch that turn on the proteins that make the cells beat. He also wants to find out how and when the cells communicate so they can beat together in synchronicity.

Collagen is a major protein secreted by the cells to create an extra-cellular environment in which the cells exist. Spooner said when the collagen around the heart is stopped, the heart will develop but it will not beat. The amount of collagen and other factors can be limited to see possible effects on heart development.

"Tools" are needed to recognize the changes in contractual proteins and its development. The "tools" are antibodies. Spooner can systematically look and see when the proteins first appear and then use antibodies that are sensitive and specific to the small amount of proteins unique to the heart.

Spooner uses an $83,000 grant from the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute in developing his research in a laboratory in Ackert Hall.

The research has the ultimate goal of recognizing heart defects and what is necessary to prevent these defects in the human heart, Spooner said.

the last chime of the bells ringing from Anderson Hall. The ceremony includes the formal reporting procedures, followed by the playing of "Taps" and the lowering of the flag.

Heyns said the entire ceremony is scheduled to last about 10 minutes.

Besides approximately 220 K-State Army and Air Force cadets, veterans from around the region have been invited to attend. Heyns said last year members of the administration who are veterans also attended.

The ceremony is sponsored by the K-State Army and Air Force ROTCs. Heyns said the two branches alternate responsibility for the ceremonies yearly. This year the Air Force is in charge.

Lori Baier, senior in mathematics and Air Force cadet commander, will direct the afternoon's ceremony.

brance will be presented by State Commander Lee Stolfus at this ceremony.

Not as close to home, another fund drive will be going on in Kansas City, Kan. A benefit concert sponsored by the Lawrence chapter of Youth for Vietnam Veterans will take place in Memorial Hall in Kansas City, Kan.

The concert, to begin at 6:30 p.m., is to feature John Fogerty, George Thorogood and the Delaware Destroyers, and Mike Finnegan on keyboards. Also scheduled to appear are Stephen Stills and David Crosby, formerly of Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young.

Funds raised are to be placed in a scholarship fund administered by Paralyzed Vietnam Veterans. The funds are to distributed to children of American veterans who are disabled, prisoners of war, missing in action or were killed in action, Klimek said.

Europeans ban Syrian arms sales

By The Associated Press

LONDON — European Common Market nations declared sanctions against Syria on Monday for alleged support of terrorism and demanded that it end all backing for terror groups.

Greece dissented, but the 11 other members agreed to ban all arms sales, suspend high-level official visits and increase surveillance of Syrian missions and operations of Syrian airlines.

President Hafez Assad's government is the Soviet Union's main Middle East ally. The effect of the arms embargo is expected to be more symbolic than practical, since Syria gets most of its weapons from the Soviets.

"Our actions have a specific purpose," said a statement issued after a meeting of the policy-making council of Common Market foreign ministers. "We look to the Syrian authorities for a constructive response."

The Socialist government of Greece said it was not convinced Syria was involved in the attempt to smuggle a bomb onto an Israeli airliner at Heathrow Airport in London last April. That case caused Britain to break relations with Syria last month and ask the Common Market to join in other sanctions.

It did not object to the sanctions, although it dissented. Theodore G. Pangalos, deputy foreign minister, said Greece does not sell arms to Syria and already is taking the other measures agreed upon by the Common Market, or European Economic Community.

In Washington, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said in announcing the Reagan administration's approval of the decision: "We believe that steps by the members of the EEC, whether collective or individual, are important in making clear that Syrian support for international terrorism is unacceptable."

The United States and Canada recalled their ambassadors from Syria shortly after Britain broke relations with Damascus on Oct. 24. Belgium later followed suit, the only Common Market member to do so.

Libya urged Arab nations to join in an economic boycott of any European country that participates in sanctions against Syria. Its official news agency JANA called the London meeting part of "a mad campaign" against its ally.

Sir Geoffrey Howe, British foreign secretary and current president of the foreign ministers' council, was asked several times for comment on reports that the United States supplied arms to Iran in exchange for the release of American hostages in Lebanon.

He did not comment directly but made clear that Britain would not make such a deal.

"The United Kingdom does not favor transactions involving the granting of favors for the release of hostages," Howe told a news conference.

France has had a significant arms trade with Syria in the past, but Foreign Minister Jean-Bernard Raimond said Monday that deliveries under contracts signed in 1982 and 1984 had been halted.

"There have been no arms deliveries for a long time," he told a news conference.

Britain has an agreement to supply Syria with "non-lethal" communications equipment worth 15 million pounds ($21.7 million), but a British spokesman said the contract would be reviewed and probably canceled.

Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's government requested the Common Market sanctions after Nezar Hindawi, a Jordanian, was convicted Oct. 24 of trying to smuggle a bomb onto the Israel airliner in his pregnant girlfriend's hand luggage.

Storm brings halt to mild autumn

Staff/Andy Nelson

Cold wind and heavy snow Monday made the going rough for a couple while walking through the Union parking lot to their car in the faculty/staff lot. The early season snowstorm left Manhattan with a dusting of powder, but clear skies and temperatures in the upper 20s to low 30s are forecast for today.

First freeze ends 'warmest' fall

By The Collegian Staff

A frigid, polar air mass, ushered in by biting winds and snow, brought a sudden halt Monday to one of the warmest autumns in history.

Mike Heathfield, meteorologist at the National Weather Service office in Topeka, said the fall, in general, has been unusual.

Heathfield said Sunday was the first day the temperature went below 32 degrees Fahrenheit this fall — the latest in history for that to occur.

"Actually, most of the fall has been rather unusual," he said. "It's unusual that it's been such a warm autumn."

However, the arrival of a cold period in the fall is to be expected.

"I think most years we get a cold snap sometime in the fall," Heathfield said.

The reason for the icy weather is an arctic cold front that has brought cold Canadian air with it. The front replaced a southwesterly air flow that had been dominating the weather the past several days. Heathfield said to expect another batch of cold air sometime Wednesday.

"This cold air will continue pushing into the area for the next few days. That is unusual," he said.

Heathfield said the Manhattan Municipal Airport recorded a temperature of 23 F at 4 p.m. Monday

Cold snap erases old record lows

By The Associated Press

Bitingly cold air spilled southward Monday from Canada, with Butte, Mont., hitting 31 degrees below zero and other cities posting record lows, on the heels of a snow storm that killed six and left a 13-year-old boy missing.

"We are heading into the time of year we all hate — cold weather," said National Weather Service forecaster Chuck McCain in Colorado.

Only scattered light snow fell Monday from the central Rockies across the Plains to the upper Great Lakes, light compared to the storm that last week dumped more than 2 feet of snow before moving into Canada.

But the snow accompanied an Arctic air mass that dropped temperatures below zero over much of Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota and western South Dakota.

Record lows for the date included Billings, Mont., 12 below zero; Casper, Wyo., 14 below; Chicago, 18; Flint, Mich., 20; Helena, Mont., 24 below; Kalispell, Mont., 8 below; Lewiston, Idaho, 14; Miles City, Mont., 13 below; Missoula, Mont., 2 below; Rapid City, S.D., 7 below; Sheridan, Wyo., 20 below; Spokane, Wash., 11; Valentine, Neb., 1; Wheatridge, Colo., 9; and Yakima, Wash., 13.

Several of the records erased marks that had been on the books since 1911. For Billings, Casper, Kalispell and Missoula, it was the earliest date on record for such cold.

Gusty wind along the eastern slopes of the Rockies in Montana dropped the wind chill effect to around 45 below at Billings and Casper during the night.

The temperature at Goodland dropped from 29 to 14 in one hour as the edge of the cold air moved through, and freeze warnings were issued as far south as parts of nor-

Officials examine arrangements to gain local merchants for mall

By TOM SCHULTES
Business/Government Editor

About two dozen local merchants and interested citizens met with leasing and marketing representatives of the Manhattan Town Center developer Monday night to discuss leasing arrangements for the downtown mall.

Steve Dworkin, senior leasing representative for Forest City Rental Properties, Cleveland, said the past five months have been spent getting acquainted with business operators in the region, noting those individuals are "just as important as local merchants."

During the meeting at The Cotton Club, 418 Poyntz Ave., Dworkin said Forest City would like to have local businesses represent 20 percent of the mall's tenants when it opens.

Gary Ceepo, project manager, said the mall will open during the last week of October 1987.

Dworkin said the term "local" includes anyone within a 50-mile radius of the mall, which he said will include Topeka and Salina.

Dworkin said many local merchants may want to be in the mall but will not be allowed to because

Adult Learning Center offers class teaching reading to city's illiterate

By MAUREEN MURPHY
Collegian Reporter

The practical drawbacks and personal effects of illiteracy are devastating. Nearly one-third of all Americans over the age of 18, including about 4,500 in Manhattan, are illiterate or semiliterate, according to statistics from the U.S. Department of Education.

Defining illiteracy is a big problem, said Joseph P. Hebert, coordinator of adult education at the Adult Learning Center in Manhattan.

There are two levels of illiteracy, he said. Functionally illiterate people are any adults with reading or communication skills below the 5th-grade level. Marginally illiterate people have skills below the 9th-grade level.

Adhering to these definitions means millions of Americans can't read a newspaper or the menu in a restaurant. Nor can they write a check the bank will process or read road signs, bus schedules or subway signs. These people often don't understand the instructions on medicine bottles and are unable to fill out a job application.

The personal effects are even more burdensome, Hebert said. Many illiterate adults feel ashamed and live in fear that their secret will be discovered.

Unsure of themselves, illiterate adults spend their lives doing menial jobs. Even their family life is affected. These people are unable to read a story to a child or help them with their homework.

Chemical accident damages Rhine

FRANKFURT, West Germany — A poisonous chemical spill in the Rhine has killed half a million fish, deprived towns of water supplies and stirred fears of long-term damage to one Europe's busiest and most scenic waterways.

French officials plan decrees against catching Rhine River fish for the next six months becauase of the spill Nov. 1 during an industrial fire in Basel, Switzerland.

Some critics are calling the spill Chernobale, after the Chernobyl nuclear disaster last April in Soviet Union. Bale is the French name for Basel.

The Swiss government said member nations of the International Rhine River Commission would hold a special meeting Wednesday in Zurich.

West German, French and Dutch officials accused Swiss authorities of slow reaction and poor cross-border coordination after the accident.

About 30 tons of toxic herbicides, pesticides and mercury poured into the Rhine along with water used to put out a fire at the Sandoz chemical plant outside Basel.

The spill, about 25 miles long, drifted slowly downstream, causing huge fish kills and contaminating water supplies of river towns.

Japan pledges loan to Philippines

TOKYO — Japan pledged a low-interest loan of more than $250 million to the Philippines on Monday, the first day of President Corazon Aquino's visit here, and her spokesman said there were indications of more aid to come.

The loan of 40.4 billion yen ($252.5 million) will finance construction of a thermal power plant in the Pacific archipelago.

Aquino left Manila at a time of rumors that disaffected military officers would attempt a coup against her 9-month-old government, but the armed forces commander sent a message Monday afternoon that the "peace and order situation is very secure and stable," spokesman Teodoro Benigno said.

The forces commanded by Gen. Fidel V. Ramos were put on alert as they were during Aquino's two previous trips abroad, to Singapore and Indonesia in August and the United States in September.

Benigno said emphasis is being placed during the 53-year-old leader's four-day "goodwill visit" on how Japan, an economic superpower, can help spur a Philippine economy crippled by $26 billion in foreign debt accumulated under former President Ferdinand E. Marcos.

Marcos, who governed the Philippines for 20 years, fled the country Feb. 26 because of a military-civilian uprising Gen. Ramos helped to lead.

Former Soviet foreign minister dies

MOSCOW — Vyacheslav M. Molotov, Stalin's right hand whose grim visage mirrored the Kremlin's hard Cold War line, is dead at age 96. The former foreign minister was among the last of the Old Bolsheviks who founded the Soviet state.

In its announcement Monday, the official Soviet news agency Tass said Molotov died Saturday.

Molotov was a humorless, round-faced man with a bristling moustache whose inflexibility in negotiations earned him the name "Iron Pants" from Western diplomats.

He was a shopkeeper's son who helped Lenin carry out the Russian revolution in 1917 and rose to the highest ranks of the Kremlin elite but never succeeded in building a personal power base.

After Josef Stalin died in 1953, Molotov was removed from his posts and gradually slid into obscurity.

For years, the only remaining official notice of his former service was a biography in the Great Soviet Encyclopedia. He lived out his last days as an old-age pensioner and frequently could be seen strolling at his dacha west of Moscow.

In recent years, however, the Soviet Union moved to rehabilitate Molotov. He was readmitted to party membership in 1984 and, in July of this year, the newspaper Moscow News carried the first interview with him in 20 years. He was quoted as saying: "I am happy in my old age. I wish to reach the age of 100."

He probably was best known in the West for signing the Molotov-Ribbentrop non-aggression pact. The agreement linked the Soviet Union with fascist Germany and enabled the Nazis to invade Poland, thus triggering World War II in 1939.

Couple sues U.S. for home damage

MUSKEGON, Mich. — A couple whose home was left teetering on a Lake Michigan bluff after a storm is suing the federal government to recover the costs of moving their house.

Joseph and Shirley Milder of Muskegon sued in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Flood Insurance Program, alleging the agency denied their claim for the $96,700 cost of moving the home back from the shore.

The suit said the government didn't recognize the Dec. 2 storm as "sufficiently severe to meet the definitions contained in the policy."

Lawyer Wilbur C. Jacobs, who is representing the Milders, said the lawsuit seeks class-action status for other Lake Michigan property owners. He estimated the lawsuit, filed last week, could have 1,000 plaintiffs.

Soldiers embark for Middle East

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky. — The 101st Airborne Division said farewell Monday to 800 soldiers embarking on a Middle East peacekeeping mission that ended tragically for 248 of their comrades last year.

"I guess it takes a lot of courage for the men to go back over there after that plane crashed," said Tresa McCreery, whose husband will be among those spending six months in the Sinai.

A similar detachment was heading home last December when an Arrow Air chartered plane crashed at Gander, Newfoundland, killing all aboard.

About 500 people gathered for the half-hour ceremony during which Maj. Gen. Burton Patrick stressed the importance of the mission and the training the troops underwent to prepare for it.

"You've trained hard and you've worked hard and it has paid off," said Patrick, the division commander. "You're ready. I know it, you know it, everybody knows it."

Judge sentences former KU official

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Richard von Ende, former executive secretary of the University of Kansas, was sentenced Monday to three years in prison on a charge of cocaine distribution.

Von Ende, 46, pleaded guilty Sept. 22 to that charge and one of conspiracy to distribute the illegal drug. He was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Earl O'Connor.

Von Ende, who is to serve his term at a federal prison in Fort Worth, Texas, will also be on parole for three years after his release, during which he must perform 200 hours of community service in drug rehabilitation.

O'Connor gave him a suspended sentence on the conspiracy count, for which he is to be on parole for five years.

Von Ende, who resigned his position with the university after pleading guilty in the cocaine case, had been a student leader and activist at KU in the late 1960s.

The government accused von Ende of distributing one gram of cocaine to Bradley J. Smoot, a former Kansas assistant attorney general, at a Kansas turnpike exit in Lawrence on Jan. 16.

Thief 'walks away' with 800 boots

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Four-hundred pairs of cowboy boots were stolen from a vendor at the American Royal Livestock, Horse Show and Rodeo during the weekend.

Someone drove off from a Kemper Arena parking lot Friday night in a pick-up truck pulling the 24-foot trailer that contained the boots and other western gear worth more than $30,000, Kansas City Police Detective Don Lauffer said.

The truck and empty trailer were found abandoned early Sunday near a playing field around Interstate 435 and 103rd Street, Lauffer said.

The truck, trailer and merchandise belong to Brad Strutzenberg, 36, of Humboldt, Iowa, who operates Brad's Discount Boots.

Lauffer said there is a $1,000 reward for information leading to recovery of the boots and arrest of the thief.

Grain science associate dies Saturday in KC

By The Collegian Staff

Morteza Maleki, 54, a University research associate in grain science and industry, died Saturday in a Kansas City hospital.

Before coming to K-State, Maleki was a professor of food technology at Shiraz University, Shiraz, Iran, from 1967 to 1985. He was a visiting professor at K-State from 1977-78 and a visiting scientist at the Federal Research Centre of Grain and Potato Processing, Detmold, Germany, from 1972-73. From 1964-67 he was an assistant professor of food technology at the American University in Beirut, Lebanon.

Maleki received his bachelor's degree in agriculture from Tehran University in Iran, his master's degree in food science from the University of California-Davis and his doctorate in food science from the University of Illinois.

He was the author of two books: "Food Science, Vol. I — Food Processing Plant and Preservation of Foods by Canning, Freezing and Dehydration" and "Food Science, Vol. II — Processing of Different Food Commodities." He also published more than 30 scientific articles in his field.

Maleki is survived by his wife, Razieh Bina, of the home; two daughters, Susan and Lili, both of the home; a son, Farhad, of the home; and five brothers.

Services are pending.

Correction

Due to a reporter's error, the records for K-State's volleyball team were listed incorrectly in Monday's Collegian. The squad's actual marks should be 12-15 overall and 2-7 in Big Eight Conference play.

Anonymous reports claim kidnappers free French hostages

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Two anonymous telephone callers to Beirut newspapers said Monday night that two French hostages had been freed by their Moslem kidnappers, but the reports could not be confirmed.

One of the callers indicated the captives might be taken to Damascus, Syria, and reliable sources in the Syrian capital said the freed hostages had arrived there and identified them as Marcel Coudari and Camille Sontag.

One of two communiques distributed earlier Monday by the Revolutionary Justice Organization said some of the group's French hostages would be freed within 48 hours as a goodwill gesture made possible by Algerian and Syrian mediation. The group, believed to be composed of Shiite Moslems, claimed that France had made promises on unspecified demands.

Shortly before midnignt an anonymous telephone caller told the independent Beirut newspaper An-Nahar that two French hostages had been freed in Moslem west Beirut's Ramlet al-Baida residential district at 7:30 p.m. (12:30 p.m. EST).

The second communique signed by the Revolutionary Justice Organization said the release would take place at 7:30 p.m. at the Hotel Beaurivage in Ramlet al-Baida near the headquarters of Syrian army officers, but reporters at the hotel said no hostages had appeared there.

At 7:55 p.m., French diplomat Guy Letrange arrived at the hotel with three bodyguards in a bullet-proof green Peugeot embassy car. A bodyguard stepped out and told reporters French Ambassador Christian Graeff had instructed them to take delivery of any freed hostages.

"We will wait," said the man, who identified himself as Jean-Claude la Bourdette, the head of Graeff's bodyguards.

The leftist Beirut newspaper As-Safir reported late Monday that it had received a telephone call from a person claiming to speak for the Revolutionary Justice Organization and it said he asked if the paper had received the report from An-Nahar.

As-Safir said an editor told the caller, "Yes we did. But can you tell us the names?" of the hostages.

It said the caller, speaking Arabic, replied, "Not right away. You will know tomorrow. Go take their pictures in Damascus."

If the hostages were turned over to Syrian officials they could have been sent overland to Damascus.

The two communiques from the extremist group were sent to the Beirut office of a Western news agency. They did not say how many hostages were to be freed.

The Revolutionary Justice Organization, thought to be loyal to Iran, has claimed responsibility for kidnapping three Frenchmen and two Americans in Moslem west Beirut.

Nineteen foreigners — including eight Frenchmen and six Americans — are missing in Lebanon and various groups have claimed responsibility for the abductions. American David Jacobsen was released Nov. 2 by another Shiite group, Islamic Jihad.

Among Frenchmen the Revolutionary Justice Organization claims to hold are two television crewmen of France's Antenne-2 station, soundman Aurel Cornea, 54, and lighting engineer Jean-Louis Normandin, 34.

They were kidnapped March 8 along with two other Antenne-2 workers, correspondent Philippe Rochot, 39, and cameraman Georges Hansen, 45, who were freed in Beirut on June 21.

Coudari, 54, of Marseille, was believed kidnapped in February, but the group announced his abduction Sept. 24.

In Paris, a spokesman for Premier Jacques Chirac said the government was encouraged but was taking "the most discreet attitude possible" in comments on the captive Frenchmen.

"That being said, it tends to be an encouraging sign, no more, no less," Denis Baudouin, the spokesman, said.

The Americans held by Revolutionary Justice are Joseph James Cicippio, 56, acting comptroller at the American University in Beirut, and Edward Austin Tracy, 55, a writer.

Other Frenchmen missing in Lebanon are Carton, 62, the French Embassy vice consul in Beirut; Marcel Fontaine, 45, an embassy protocol officer; Jean-Paul Kauffmann, 43, a French journalist; Michel Seurat, 38, a French academic researcher; and retired automobile dealer Camille Sontag, 85.

On March 5, Islamic Jihad, another Shiite Moslem group believed loyal to Iran, claims Seurat was "executed." No body has been found.

Soviets accuse U.S. of revising summit

Foreign minister attacks U.S. position

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze accused the United States on Monday of trying to "erode the ground reached in Reykjavik." He demanded anew that a superpower arms accord include a ban on space weapons.

Shevardnadze characterized his meetings last week with Secretary of State George P. Shultz as a "retreat to the pre-Reykjavik position" in U.S.-Soviet relations, adding, "It goes without saying that this is a step backward."

He spoke in Russian at a one hour, 50-minute news conference, his first in Moscow since becoming foreign minister in July 1985. The Foreign Ministry conference hall was packed.

Shevardnadze said that Mikhail S. Gorbachev and President Reagan agreed during their Oct. 11-12 Iceland summit to steps that would eliminate medium-range missiles from Europe within five years and all strategic nuclear weapons within a decade.

But he said Shultz outlined a revised and watered down version of the agreements in principle reached by the two leaders.

"What they offered to us in Vienna can be compared to a political theater of the absurd," said Shevardnadze.

"We had set on the table before us an amazing assortment of papers which actually canceled everything achieved by the sides in Reykjavik.

"The United States wanted to record positions that would erode the ground reached in Reykjavik."

The news conference was the latest stage of a full-fledged media campaign by the Kremlin following the summit. Gorbachev held a news conference in Reykjavik and gave two nationally televised addresses after his return to spell out the Kremlin's view of the meetings.

The Kremlin also released two purported quotes from Reagan during the summit that it contended proved he agreed to scrap all strategic weapons.

Monday's news conference seemed intended to underline the Soviet view following the Vienna talks, which ended with no further agreement on high-level superpower meetings.

Shevardnadze said he presented Shultz with a framework agreement that the two of them could have signed and passed on to arms negotiators in Geneva for working into the text of an arms control treaty.

The package restated the Soviet side's understanding of the Reykjavik agreements on strategic and medium-range missiles and called for a commitment by both sides to observe for 10 years the provisions of the 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty.

It was the ABM issue which prevented an arms agreement at Reykjavik.

Live POWs concern of Vietnam veteran

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — This is the year of the live prisoner of war, said Ben Fontana, a Vietnam veteran who spoke to passers-by at a booth outside the Vietnam Memorial Sunday.

"We want the American people to understand that there are live POWs," Fontana said.

Veteran Patty Taylor said there have been over 400 sightings of live prisoners in Vietnam.

Since 1982, veterans have been asking U.S. citizens to sign petitions urging the government in Hanoi to account for Americans still alive in Vietnam. Fontana said more than 11 million signatures have been sent to Hanoi.

A petition urging President Ronald Reagan to work toward the release of POWs also has been circulated.

"We know for a fact that there are over 1,000 (POWs) alive in Vietnam," Fontana said. "Reagan made a promise saying that POWs were his highest national priority and he hasn't kept his promise."

Taylor wore a button that read, "Veteran's Day, 1986, is day 4,975 for our hostages in Southeast Asia."

"They don't announce that on the news like they did the Iranian hostages," she said.

The Vietnam Memorial is carved with 58,000 names of soldiers who died in the war. In honor of Veteran's Day, pictures and obituaries of men who died in the war, American flags and flowers were scattered along the memorial's wall. One bouquet of flowers was wrapped with a ribbon proclaiming, "We cannot forget."

Officials can check nuclear testing, Soviets say

By The Associated Press

LA JOLLA, Calif. — A private agreement for U.S. and Soviet scientists to monitor both nations' nuclear test sites is a sincere attempt to eliminate all nuclear weapons testing and is no propaganda ploy, a Soviet scientist said Monday.

"I would like to tell the American people that without nuclear testing we can live more peacefully and more successfully than with nuclear testing," said Igor Leonovich Nersesov, a seismologist from the Soviet Academy of Sciences' Institute of Physics of the Earth.

Last May, the academy and the Washington-based Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group, agreed to install seismometers to monitor earth tremors from underground nuclear bomb tests at the main testing sites in the Soviet Union and the United States.

The agreement is meant to show it is possible to verify compliance with any future comprehensive test ban treaty and with the unratified treaties that limit underground bomb tests to 150 kilotons, said Thomas Cochran, senior staff scientist for the U.S. group.

In July, Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle said the agreement was viewed by Moscow as an opportunity to score propaganda points.

But Nersesov said the program "can show we can work together...and will demonstrate the possibility to stop the nuclear testing by joint work."

"I can't understand why it is (seen as) propaganda," said Nersesov, who led a delegation of five Soviet seismologists who arrived in San Diego on Sunday night for a week-long trip through the United States.

In July, American scientists serving as consultants to the U.S. group installed seismometers at three locations around the principal Soviet test site near Semipalatinsk, about 1,800 miles southeast of Moscow. They plan to return next January to install more sophisticated seismometers.

During their meeting Monday, the Soviet and American scientists discussed where to install seismometers around the Nevada Test Site northwest of Las Vegas.

Dairy club to host talk on community service

By The Collegian Staff

Involvement of young people in community activities will be the topic addressed at 7:30 tonight at the Dairy Science Club meeting in Call 205.

A person's political philosophy should change with what he's involved with, said Mark Spire, featured speaker and associate professor of surgery and medicine.

Spire is vice chairman of the Riley County Republican Party and serves on the state Republican Party Agriculture Platform Subcommittee.

In paraphrasing Judge Richard Rogers, Spire said one should be a moderate in his community, a liberal in his state and conservative at the national level.

The dairy club intends to emphasize leadership in all activities, not just in politics, said John Shirley, club adviser and associate professor of animal science.

"The Dairy Science Club is very tied to community service activities," he said. "We think this makes for a more well-rounded individual."

The meeting is open to the public.

State should support students, universities

In the words of a national education commission, public officials who propose budget reductions in education are "unthinkingly abetting an act of national suicide."

The commission, headed by former Secretary of Education Terrel H. Bell, chastised the Reagan administration for cutting aid to college students. The commission on Sunday called for doubling the number of college graduates by the year 2000.

In a report for the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, the commission urged states to keep tuition low and increase recruitment of minorities. The goal is to stop the growth of "an American underclass."

The commission is not exaggerating the seriousness of the government's role in the growing separation between educated and uneducated people in the United States. Two decades ago, it was possible, though difficult, for uneducated people to acquire positions of power and to acquire high-paying jobs. However, technology and the attitude of society toward uneducated people make social mobility less attainable.

As new leaders come to power in Kansas, they must take the report to heart. Kansas still has one of the nation's best educational systems for the price. The state must not cut funding to its greatest assets — its students and schools. It should capitalize on those assets and increase funding whenever possible. The returns from the investment would soon become evident.

Soviet announcement benefits human rights

A Soviet foreign minister, in an announcement last week, said something quite surprising.

Amidst legal measures to speed up emigration proceedings in the Soviet Union, Anatoly Kovalev said the move was among "serious reforms that will introduce more democracy to our country."

That a Soviet administrator would use the word "democracy" in meaning it to be a compliment to his country is a signal to Americans that at least the Soviets realize the differences between economic and political systems.

Can you imagine the reaction in this country if Secretary of State George Shultz said an action by the U.S. government reflected reforms that will introduce more communism to our country?

Most Americans, believing communism to be a political system rather than an economic system, would be arming themselves in seconds.

In fact, the Soviets always have claimed to have a "people's democracy," and examples of "communism" in America are numerous.

Keeping in mind that communism actually is based on economics and collective action, sororities and fraternities are probably one of our best examples. Unions provide irrefutable evidence of communistic tendencies.

The point is, in attempts for the Soviet Union and United States to overcome misunderstanding, both governments must realize the good in both systems. Recently, the Soviets have been taking these steps by opening communication and by speeding up the emigration process from their country.

The Soviet Union should be commended for these changes in policy. The United States should take some lessons in compromise and diplomacy.

Education, jobs help inmates learn to cope

Inmates at the U.S. Penitentiary at Leavenworth have a chance to earn some money while doing their time.

About 500 inmates are employed by four different industries that operate inside the maximum-security prison. This is the largest production group in the federal prison system. Products produced by the inmates and sold to government agencies include T-shirts, mattresses, paint brushes, furniture and canvas mail bags. Last year, these products accounted for $34 million in sales and $7.5 million in profits for the prison.

Inmates at the prison can earn between 22 cents and $1.10 an hour, depending on their experience and how fast they can work. Most workers average $130 a month, of which they can spend up to $95 in the prison commissary. The remainder is placed in bank accounts. Demand is so high for these jobs that prison officials say there is a waiting list for prisoners seeking work.

The practice of allowing prisoners to work is a move toward the goal of rehabilitation. Giving inmates a good environment in which to form work habits is much better than the old practice of locking criminals up together and expecting them to learn their lesson. The only lesson they will learn is how not to get caught next time.

This is a step forward, but it needs to be followed by a program of education. Many convicted felons lack even the most basic skills of literacy that would allow them to find employment in society. The federal and state governments need to implement a program to teach inmates how to be good citizens. Most of these people would not be in prison if they knew the difference between right and wrong.

We need to work on educating everyone, not just prisoners. This would be a pre-emptive strike against crime. As the literacy rate falls, the crime rate will rise.

Veterans' achievements admirable

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

For most of us, today will pass like every other day. However, for many Americans, it is a reminder of a very special, though perhaps unpleasant, time of their lives.

This is the day set aside to honor those men and women who, out of service to their country, endured the scourge of war with the hope that future generations would not have to suffer similar experiences. This is Veterans Day.

Among the veterans that we will honor today are a special few who have done more than served as a reminder of the courage necessary to serve our country and of the need to avoid war. In their lives after the war, they have continued to be an inspiration to us. I'm sure we can all think of veterans from our home communities, but there are a few whose triumphs after the war have earned them special recognition.

Disabled veterans have always served as an inspiration to me. Their mere will to live is enough to humble the accomplishments of those lucky enough to lead normal lives. But even with physical or mental impairment, there are those who are unstoppable.

One of these veterans, Bob Wieland, became the first person to complete a marathon running with his arms instead of his legs. The 40-year-old Californian, who lost both his legs when he stepped on a mortar round in Vietnam 17 years ago, finished the New York City Marathon last week.

At an average speed of 1 mph, the 26-mile marathon took Wieland a lot longer than the other contestants. In the amount of time it took marathon winner Gianni Poli to win the race, it took Wieland that long just to cross the Verrazano Bridge. Nonetheless, his record slowest time of a little more than four days still made him a champion. Groups of children following him in Brooklyn said to him, "They should have given you the Mercedes" that went to Poli.

Wieland's successes don't stop there. He is a member of the President's Council on Physical Fitness and in 1982 began a 2,784-mile "Walk for Hunger" across the continent. When he completed the journey last May, he had raised more than $300,000.

The political arena has its share of disabled veteran success stories. Among them is Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., who lost use of his right arm from battle injuries in Europe during World War II. In fact, the injury forced him to switch his educational plans from medicine to law and, most certainly, to a life in public office.

Gov. Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., is another disabled veteran who has championed public life with the attitude that his only limitations are in his head. His war injury that left him a leg amputee doesn't keep this Medal of Honor-winning Vietnam veteran from running six miles a day. And that may not be all he's running for. By retiring from the governorship, many people are speculating that the 43-year-old Kerrey will be making a bid for the presidency.

Other veterans who did not suffer such severe disabilities also have proved that being a veteran is second nature to being a hero. One example is Louis Zamperini, who already was a hero before going to the Pacific in World War II. A top finisher in the 1936 Berlin Olympics, Zamperini climbed a flagpole and tore down a Nazi banner while guards fired shots.

Missing in action and presumed dead when his plane crashed in the Pacific, Zamperini spent 47 days on a raft and 28 months in enemy captivity to earn the Medal of Honor. When he returned home after the war, he began training for the 1948 Olympics. But injuries received while he was a prisoner forced him to give up that dream and turn to something much worse — alcoholism.

As Zamperini tells the story, when listening to Billy Graham, he recalled the promises he made on the raft to seek and serve God. Today, he runs a nutritional program for senior citizens in Hollywood. On weekends, he runs Victory Camp, which he founded to teach mountaineering, survival and rescue skills to youth — skills he learned on his raft during the war.

All of these veterans could have done what New York City Marathon officials thought Bob Wieland had done — given up. As Wieland explained after the marathon, "It would have been a waste of energy." Explaining the view shared by him and the other veterans, he said, "Success is not based on where you start, it's based on where you finish, and I finished."

Marchers work for arms reduction

JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

I just returned from a four-day collegiate journalism convention in Washington, D.C. Though the setting for the meeting may have been chosen for other reasons, touring and meeting activists in Washington was the highlight of my trip.

Saturday, two other K-State students and I went sightseeing. After walking all afternoon, we complained of sore feet and aching legs as we trudged toward the Washington Monument. When we approached the tower, our attention was diverted by a representative of "The Great Peace March For Global Nuclear Disarmament," at a table across the street.

The magnitude of my aches diminished when I learned this man had marched more than 1,000 miles for his cause.

About 1,000 non-violent protesters have been walking across the United States since March 1. The man we met had forged ahead of the rest to inform local citizens that peace marchers will soon walk "The Last Mile" in front of the White House. On Nov. 15, their journey of more than 3,500 miles will end, but members will continue to voice their concerns in peace groups.

The purpose of the march is summarized in a pamphlet the representative distributed. The statement of purpose ended, "We believe that by walking together, we will be one step closer to a world free of nuclear weapons and a world free of war."

Bill O'Neill, media co-director of The Great Peace March, said that during their travel, members have spoken with more than 1 million people. By marching across the country and talking to a magnitude of people, they could accomplish more than they would by casting their 1,000 votes. The group is asking Americans to write to their congressional members to vote against increased nuclear arms legislation.

In addition to informing people, the representative sold buttons, T-shirts and bumper stickers to raise money for the walkers. He said each peace marcher had donated $3,000 for food supplies and marching equipment, but funds had diminished after only two weeks.

A quote from Albert Einstein was written on one of the stickers. It stated, "You Cannot Simultaneously Prevent And Prepare For War."

When analyzed in various situations, the relevance of the message can be seen more clearly. It can be compared with drawing up a divorce contract before consumating marriage or putting off direct payment by purchasing unaffordable "necessities" with a credit card.

Today is Veterans Day, a time to honor those who survived their tour of duty in a foreign war. It should also be a time for Americans to consider the power of nuclear weapons to destroy not only unfortunate servicemen but all mankind.

After an invention has proliferated, total elimination is nearly unattainable. But substantial reduction of nuclear weapons is possible. With it would come a new sense of security, trust and a lessening of tensions between world powers.

U.S. supports terror

Editor,

U.S. taxpayers should know that the millions of dollars Congress voted for contra aid will finance a terror campaign against Western European aid projects and development helpers in Nicaragua. Here is the record this year:

Feb. 17 — Contra ambush kills Swiss agricultural expert Maurice Demierre and six civilians in Somotillo.

April 15 — German director Dietmar Schoenherr witnesses a contra attack on the agricultural cooperative he had sponsored near Matagalpa. Seven peasants are killed.

May 17 — Contras kidnap eight West German development volunteers.

May 20 — The agricultural cooperative "Teodosio Pravio," sponsored by the Swiss Trade Union Federation, is attacked by contras. Eight people are killed.

May 31 — Contras attack another Swiss-sponsored agricultural cooperative in Yale and kill 16 people.

May 24 and June 4 — Contras kill a Spanish nurse and Belgian agronomist.

July 28 — Contras ambush and kill Swiss development helper Yvan Leyvraz, his West German colleague, Bernhard Kalberstein, and French communications technician Joel Fioux.

These victims were not accidentally caught in the crossfires of war. The contra attacks are consciously designed to discourage further development projects and induce West Germany, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium and other Western European countries to stop foreign aid to Nicaragua.

Contra spokesman Indalecio Rodriguez made this clear when he said this summer that all international development technicians in Nicaragua would henceforth be considered "military targets" for the contras. According to Swiss development experts, contra radio stations in Honduras have broadcast the names and car license plate numbers of "international bastards" — i.e., development helpers — targeted for killing.

I hope the day will soon come when the people of our country put an end to our government's support for contra terror. Nicaragua will then be able to resume its progress toward economic and political democracy.

Annual show opens, displays pork exhibit

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Individuals involved in the pork industry will be converging on Manhattan beginning today for the annual Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show at the Holiday Inn Holidome, 530 Richards Drive.

One of the activities is Swine Day, scheduled for Thursday, which includes executive meetings of the Kansas Pork Producers Council. Trade show exhibits will be displayed all day Wednesday and Thursday.

The featured speaker scheduled for tonight's meeting is Ken Root, National Farm Broadcaster Association president, who will talk about the agricultural economy in Russia.

Two programs, "Pork, the Elite Meat" and "Creative Financing for the Farmers," and board of directors meetings are scheduled for Wednesday morning.

Sam Brownback, state secretary of agriculture, is scheduled to speak to the producers Wednesday afternoon, said Mary Kay Humerickhouse, executive assistant of Kansas Pork Producers Council. Annual meetings and a pork-cutting demonstration will round out the afternoon's activities, she said.

"Pork producer members will be eligible to win a Caribbean cruise at a drawing held Wednesday during 'Casino Night,'" Humerickhouse said.

Thursday's Swine Day will feature seminars at 10 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. Concerns related to market hog weights and its production and economic aspects, the lean value market program and what's new in baby pig nutrition are the seminar topics for the morning session.

The Thursday afternoon seminar, "Avoiding the Common Mistakes and Stress That Lead to the Family Farm Conflict," will be given by Ron Hanson from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln.

A research update will be given by K-State professors, and an open house will be held at the K-State swine unit following Hanson's presentation, Humerickhouse said.

"An awards banquet honoring pork producers throughout Kansas and allied industry friends will conclude the show and meetings," she said. "There is no registration cost, but we do ask that participants register at the Holidome's front desk."

Positive rural change focus of meeting

By SCOTT SHORTER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Family Center and the College of Human Ecology will be hosting a conference on "Future of the Rural Families in the Heartland" on Nov. 21 and 22.

The conference will highlight resources that are available to help people work together to bring about a more desirable future for rural America, said Steve Bollman, conference director and professor of human development and family studies.

The conference program is one of the most comprehensive examinations of the human dimension of the rural economic crisis to date, Bollman said. Discussion will focus on specific steps that can and are being taken to assist rural families and communities in responding to an uncertain period of change. The conference will help individuals be active in making decisions that deal with changes in rural areas, he said.

Attending the conference will be 80 professionals from 12 Midwestern states to present more than 50 workshops and discussions on how rural people can work together to create positive change.

The conference will include specific workshops for professionals working in public schools, churches, health services, community leadership positions, counseling centers, farmer assistance programs, adult education and retraining programs, extension services and other human services.

University credit is available for attending the conference, with the credit hours applying to the spring semester. Upon completion of additional academic requirements, one or two hours of graduate or undergraduate credit will be given through the Department of Human Development and Family Studies.

To obtain the credit hours, participants will be required to write an evaluation of each session attended and a comprehensive paper using the knowledge learned in the conference, Bollman said.

Bollman said he is expecting 200 to 300 people to attend this year's conference. Last year's conference had 150 participants.

The cost per person is $60, which covers all workshops, general sessions, program materials and refreshment break. Participants may choose to attend one day with a $30 registration fee.

Registrations will be accepted the day of the conference, said Jennifer White, graduate student in family and child development.

Among the topics to be discussed at this year's conference are: Sustaining Relationships, The Impact on Families: Translations for the Future, Community Development Concerns and Youth and the Rural Crisis.

Officials honor Polish woman for hiding Jews

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A woman being honored for saving nine Jews from the Nazis by hiding them beneath the floor of her home in Poland said Monday that her courage was a result of youthful ignorance.

"I didn't even realize what was going on. I was very brave then," said Stephania Macugowski, 74, in an interview on ABC-TV's "Good Morning America."

Macugowski and her husband, Jozef, arrived from Poland on Saturday and were reunited with four of the nine people they saved during World War II. They are to be recognized by Israeli officials Sunday as "righteous among the nations," gentiles who risked their lives for Jews.

Among those joining in the tearful reunion were the Radza sisters — Miriam Oginski, Sarah Wiener and Zahava Burack — and their cousin, Sarah Bak, who spent 2 ½ years hidden in a 20-inch-deep trench under the Macugowskis' house in Novy Korczyn.

The Radzas were children at the time; their parents, Louis and Gitla, who also survived by hiding in the bunker, died 10 years ago.

Macugowski, a Roman Catholic, asked why he risked his life to save the Jews, replied in Polish, and Zahava Burack translated.

"He says they felt they had an obligation to us, and an obligation to God, to save some people," Burack said.

The Macugowskis were acquaintances of Louis Radza, and had once offered casually to help them if there was ever a need.

When the Nazis ordered the family to board trains to go to concentration camps, Radza, his wife and three of his four daughters instead ducked into the Macugowski home.

A fourth daughter, Rita, was lost in the confusion and was sent to the notorious Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, but survived the war.

The Macugowskis and Razdas dug a five-foot-by-seven-foot trench under a storage room in the house, and the Razdas remained there for the rest of the war — silent, eating bread and water, unable to stand.

The Radzas had lost touch with the Macugowskis 10 years ago, but found them again recently.

University speech, hearing clinic tests campus, community

By LORI LUGINBILL
Collegian Reporter

The ability to communicate can often be taken for granted, and only when the ability is taken away can it be appreciated.

A special center on campus offers a variety of speech, language and hearing services to those with communication problems and gives speech pathology and audiology students some pre-professional experience.

The K-State Speech and Hearing Center, located in Leasure Hall, is sponsored by the Department of Speech, said Ken Kallail, director of the speech pathology and audiology program.

Kallail said one purpose the center serves is to provide professional speech, language and hearing services to students and those of the local and regional communities.

The center also provides a clinical laboratory for speech pathology and audiology students, who usually are exposed to the center at the senior level and can continue through graduate school, if desired, he said.

"The fact that the students get pre-professional experience with a wide variety of ages, who have a wide variety of problems, is exciting," Kallail said. "We see people of all ages. The youngest is 18 months on up to the geriatric population."

Since the late 1950s, the center has provided two types of professional services, he said.

Treatment of speech and sound problems, such as stuttering, mispronouncing words, hoarseness and pitch, are offered through the center, Kallail said. Language problems of understanding and expressing also are treated.

Services are available for victims of physical disorders that cause communication problems such as strokes, laryngectomy, cerebral palsy, Parkinson's disease, cleft palate and developmental delays, he said.

Full-time students and their dependants receive all services at the center free of charge, Kallail said.

Fees for anyone else are based on the individual's ability to pay. Some individuals receive up to a 90-percent discount, he said.

"We give away about $5,000 to $10,000 a year in free services," Kallail said.

Persons needing assistance must make an appointment at the center. However, a walk-in clinic is provided every Monday from 10:30 a.m. to noon and Wednesday from 9:30 to 11 a.m. for students without an appointment, Kallail said.

Speech students are qualified to provide treatment through academic accomplishments and practical experience gained at the center, he said. As an undergraduate, the student works with children in the Manhattan Head Start Program.

Kallail said a graduate student must student teach for eight weeks at organizations such as the Capper Foundation in Topeka (a private school for the physically handicapped), the Veterans Administration hospitals in Kansas City and Topeka or Big Lakes Developmental Center, 1500 Hayes Drive.

The campus center has an agreement with the Early Childhood Laboratory, a preschool sponsored by the College of Human Ecology, that allows students of the center to provide services in a classroom setting to children with communication disorders.

Students also gain experience by working with local nursing homes, a stroke support group at The St. Mary Hospital and the New Voice Club, a laryngectomy support group, he said.

EARLY ENROLLMENT

Spring Students: Early enrollment for Spring Semester is coming

Dates are November 17—December 5

Appointments for the Enrollment Center are printed on your Class Enrollment forms.

Location of Class Enrollment Forms:

College	Location
Agriculture	Adviser's office
Architecture & Design	Department Offices
Arts & Sciences	Pre-professional and undeclared in Dean's Office—Others in Department offices
Business Administration	Pre-professional and general in Calvin 107—Others in Department offices
Education	Bluemont Hall, Rm. 13
Engineering	Department Offices
Human Ecology	Adviser's Office
Graduate School	Dean's office

Dates are assigned on a priority system of hours completed

Class	Beginning Priority Dates
Graduates	November 17-19
Seniors	November 17-19
Juniors	November 20-21
Sophomores	November 21-24
Freshmen	November 25-Dec. 4
Others	December 4-5

If you miss your priority time, you can enroll any time through December 5.

Note: Two groups of class enrollment forms have an incorrect date:
—If your form indicates you enroll on November 22 you should go to the Enrollment Center on November 24
—If your form indicates you enroll on November 26 you should go to the enrollment center on December 1.

'Huskers, Sooners, Buffs making bowl plans

By The Associated Press

If Nebraska and Oklahoma win this weekend and enter their Nov. 22 meeting with identical records, the schools should try to arrange for the loser to go to a major bowl, Nebraska football coach Tom Osborne said.

Osborne said he talked the matter over with Barry Switzer, coach of the Sooners.

"We both have the feeling that if we win this week and go into the last week 9-1, it may be desirable to have some kind of arrangement," Osborne said.

Nebraska, 4-1 in the Big Eight Conference, plays Saturday at Kansas.

Oklahoma and Colorado, conference co-leaders at 5-0, face each other Saturday in Boulder, Colo.

If Colorado beats Oklahoma and then defeats K-State the following week, the Buffaloes go to the Orange Bowl as the undefeated Big Eight champion.

If Oklahoma defeats Colorado and Nebraska beats Kansas, the winner of the Oklahoma-Nebraska game would probably get the Orange Bowl berth.

Osborne said Sunday he would like to take his Cornhuskers to the Orange Bowl as Big Eight champions.

"But I think both Nebraska and Oklahoma have to be realistic and have a plan B if that doesn't happen," he said.

He said representatives of the Sugar, Cotton and Florida Citrus bowls have expressed an interest in Nebraska, but there are no proposals.

"I've just had a lot of handshakes," he said.

Conversation at the weekly coaches' teleconference centered around the Colorado-Oklahoma matchup this week.

Give Oklahoma the edge in overall team speed and experience with the wishbone offense, say coaches who have seen both teams this year. But Colorado, they agree, has the superior kicking game.

No coach was willing to predict a winner in the Sooner-Buffalo title showdown this week. But a certain reticent, self-effacing Oklahoma linebacker is not so cautious.

"I think, basically, we'll be cheering for touchdowns the same ratio they'll be cheering for first downs," Oklahoma's Brian Bosworth said when plugged into the conference. "I think our defense can shell-shock them. I think they haven't played against a defense this year that runs as well as we do."

Asked to predict a score, the junior all-American showed why he's known as "Bulletin Board Bosworth."

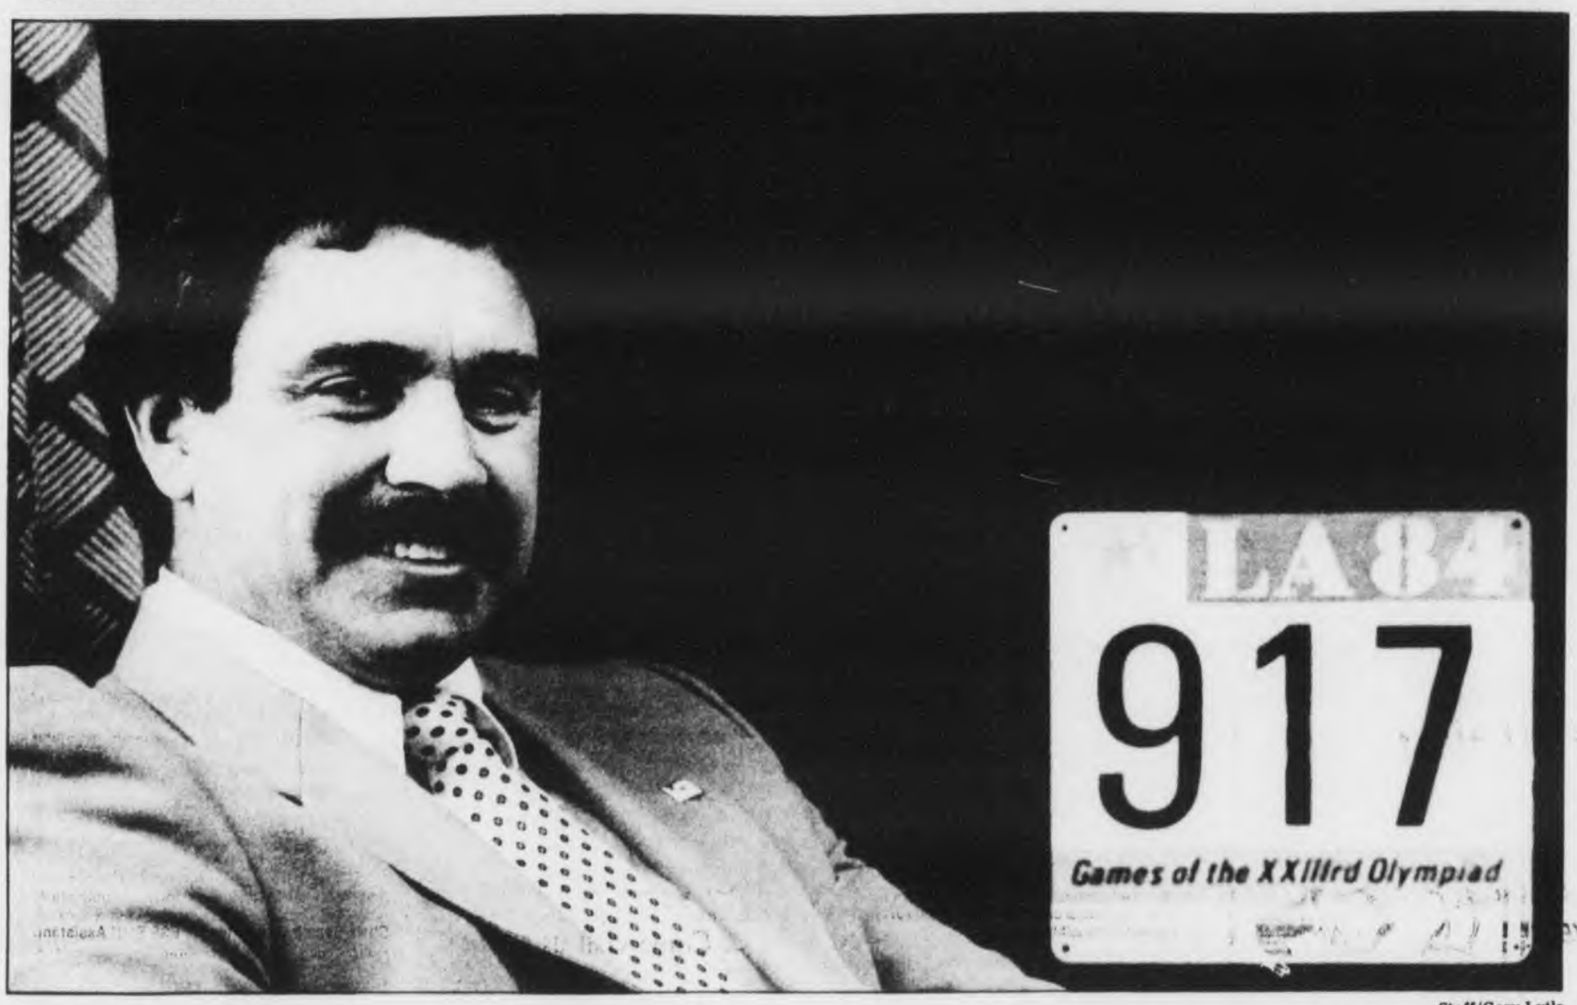
"I think if we get off to a quick start we'll top the score we had last year — 31 points," he said. "I would say it would be somewhere...in the 30s. I don't see them scoring at all unless it's on a trick play."

Colorado Coach Bill McCartney, perhaps trying to get his players fired up, said he thought Oklahoma would have "a concern" for the Buffs, who have recovered from an 0-4 start to become 5-4 and unbeaten in the Big Eight.

"I don't know if they're approaching this as a big game, to be honest with you," McCartney said. "I think they have some concern for us, but not a lot of respect."

"I'd say that was a pretty good statement," Bosworth said when told of McCartney's words. "I've watched the Nebraska film and I just don't understand some of the defensive schemes Nebraska was running against Colorado. It wasn't real sound. We don't run our defense that way. We know how to defend against the wishbone."

The Colorado wishbone, Bosworth said, "looks like it's pretty easy to read."



The Oklahoma defense, ranked No. 1 in the nation, has not allowed a touchdown by an offense since the Texas game five weeks ago.

"We feel we have a more legitimate shot to get a shutout this week than we've had probably for any game this year simply because of the fact they don't throw the ball that much," Bosworth said.

Iowa State Coach Jim Criner believes Colorado will have a chance to beat the Sooners if they play "great defense."

"Oklahoma has so much more team speed than Colorado that they really threaten you constantly," Criner said. "Colorado has very good players, but they don't have their speed. If they play great, great defense they've got a chance because they are so good in the kicking game."

"I think Oklahoma does a few more things out of their wishbone than Colorado does," said Oklahoma State Coach Pat Jones.

Top reserve players will capture honors at Southern schools

By The Associated Press

With much of last year's senior class now playing in the National Basketball Association, the race for supremacy in the South will be won by the team doing the most with the players left behind.

Reigning champion Louisville lost Milt Wagner, Billy Thompson and Jeff Hall, the catalysts for their rush to the NCAA crown. Kentucky lost Kenny Walker to graduation, while North Carolina watched center Brad Daugherty and guard Steve Hale move on. Duke, which lost to Louisville in the championship game, graduated its four senior starters.

The list of losses is long, and Louisville coach Denny Crum sees that as a sign of a very balanced 1986-87 season.

"I'd say it's pretty wide open. I think there's no question that the balance is much deeper than it's ever been before," says Crum. "Looking around, there are a lot of teams on paper who look a little bit stronger."

So where is the strength in the South? Crum says take a look down Tobacco Road.

"I like North Carolina's chances because they have two outstanding guards with experience," he says. "I think they have a good balance of inside and outside players."

Coach Dean Smith's freshman class was rated among the best in the nation, good enough to earn early recognition as the nation's best team. But Smith thinks he'll have trouble getting by in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

"Keep in mind they're prospects, but they're excellent prospects," says Smith of his freshmen — J.R. Reid, Scott Williams and Pete Chilcutt. Combined with returning senior guard Kenny Smith and sophomore backcourt mate Jeff Lebo, the experts think North Carolina is the team to catch.

But getting through the Atlantic Coast Conference is the first challenge and within the league's ranks, Georgia Tech and North Carolina State could join the chase for the Final Four in New Orleans.

The Yellow Jackets, a preseason No. 1 last year, lost the outside touch of Mark Price and inside power of John Salley. But returning starters Bruce Dalrymple and Duane Ferrell key the attack which could get Coach Bobby Cremins his second league title.

N.C. State's one full year with Chris Washburn and Charles Shackleford on the front line almost resulted in a Final Four appearance. Washburn is gone, but Coach Jim Valvano isn't lacking for talent. The 6-foot-10 Shackleford returns for his sophomore year, transfer Mike Giomi will provide immediate help inside and Bennie Bolton can score from the small forward spot.

The Cardinals, Crum says, are in search of a backcourt that might bear even a slight resemblance to the Wagner-Hall duo. That search alone is needed to help Louisville compete in its own Metro Conference, a league which like the ACC lost a lot of talent at the end of last season.

Louisville will look to Pervis Ellison for leadership — and points — in the middle. Mark McSwain has assumed the sixth man's role, but after that, Crum says it's a toss up as to who will help guide his team.

Crum sees challenges to his Metro title from Florida State and Southern Mississippi, both of whom made charges late last season. The Seminoles lost only one player from a 12-17 team and look to be stronger with returning forward Randy Allen. Southern Mississippi was picked to finish last in the Metro last year, but closed at fourth with a 6-6 league mark and a 17-12 overall slate. Coach M.K. Turk was the league's coach of the year and has five starters back.

Last year's NCAA tournament was supposed to be the ACC's showcase, but the Southeastern Conference grabbed a lot of the attention, sending two teams to the finals in the Southeast Regional and another team to the finals in the West Regional. Four teams from the league went into the 64-team field and two of them knocked off ACC teams.

Best of the SEC contenders seems to be Alabama, where 6-9 Derrick McKey can use the experience of his freshman season to lead the Crimson Tide this year. But there's more beyond McKey. Terry Coner led the SEC in assists, while Jim Farmer contributed almost 13 points a game.

Chuck Person is gone, but Auburn will have four experienced starters back. Among them is Frank Ford, who has been moved into Person's forward spot and Terrance Howard will move into Ford's spot.

Steve Miller, K-State's track and field and cross country coach the past five years, recently has taken the position as associate athletic director. In addition to his job, he is asked to speak more than 200 times a year to groups on motivation and the importance of good self-perception.

Miller bases speeches from experiences in athletic events as participant, coach

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

If people can be in touch with their feelings and perception of themselves, life can be a much greater experience, according to Steve Miller, associate athletic director at K-State.

Miller, who accomplished many milestones while coaching K-State's track and field team the past five years, has moved from the coaching ranks into administrative duties with the athletic department.

In addition to his job, he is asked to speak more than 200 times a year to groups on motivation and the importance of good perception of one's self.

"We historically keep ourselves down and we rarely seek the level where we go out and try and be the best we can," Miller said. "It is like a girl coming to her parents and saying she wants to be president. The parents' reaction is, 'Quiet down, dear. You may embarass us.' They also tell her that there has never been a female president.

"Instead, they could say, 'I will tell you what, dear. We have a shot at this and these are the things we have to do. If it works out, great. If not, what have we lost?'"

Miller has given these presentations for almost 20 years and has traveled throughout the world to speak. His themes usually are based on his experiences in track and field as an athlete and a coach.

Miller said he gained much of his inspiration when he suffered a injury while playing professional football.

As a member of the Detroit Lions of the National Football League, Miller was hit on the back of a leg and thigh, simultaneously, resulting in partial loss of feeling in the injured leg. Miller, who now has to wear a brace at all times, had a professional career that lasted four games.

After the career-ending injury, Miller said he realized there is more to life than athletics.

"I do not think I have a right to think Steve Miller has the answers. I do not have the answers," he said. "I do not go out and try to tell people to do things a particular way.

"What I try and tell people is that there are a lot of variables and alternatives in the world, and maybe we should think about these things. Maybe if we think about these things, we will have a chance to change our own life."

Miller's strong convictions to his philosophy and his strong background in the English language have helped him become a speaker in high demand.

"I tell a story about someone waking up in the morning and seeing a big pimple on the end of their nose. That person says, 'Gee, this pimple is a sign that I am not very good looking anymore.' The person spends the whole day knowing that everbody is looking at the pimple. Instead, they should say, 'Hey, this is me and who I am, and if I have a pimple, that is part of the deal of being me,'" Miller said.

Miller originally spoke to athletic groups about track and field, but he now speaks to a variety of groups ranging from fraternities to real estate agents. He relates his speeches to athletics, but only because that is where his experience lies.

Some of the different speeches he gives are titled, "One Person Can Make a Difference," "I am Somebody," "What Is Wrong With Winning?" and "Where Have all the Heroes Gone?"

"I frequently ask people in my au-

Head injury results in RB missing games

K-State running back Todd Moody will be held out of the last two games of the season against Iowa State and Colorado because of a concussion he sustained in Saturday's game against Oklahoma State.

Moody's not playing is a precautionary measure because he sustained two earlier concussions during his career as a Wildcat, Coach Stan Parrish said Monday.

Moody, a 6-foot-2, 200-pounder, is the 'Cats' second-leading rusher this season with 306 yards. He gained 63 yards in the 23-3 loss to the Cowboys before being knocked unconscious on a hit by Oklahoma State defensive back Mark Moore midway through the fourth quarter.

Moody, a senior from Ashland, completed his career with 1,022 yards.

The remaining running backs for the 'Cats are fullbacks Ray Wilson and Maurice Henry and tailbacks Tony Jordan, Dimitrie Scott and John Williams, a converted wide receiver.

University will host title games; playoffs start tonight in 4 classes

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

Kansas high-school football players know where the respective state championship games will be played.

And starting tonight, state playoff qualifiers will begin determining which teams will play in those title matchups.

KSU Stadium will be the site of the Kansas State High School Activities Association Class 5A, 3A and 2A-1A title games on Nov. 29, according to Lee Moon, assistant athletic director at K-State.

"We're pleased and proud to have the games here," Moon said. "It's a great opportunity to have people see our facilities."

During "State-Championship Saturday," Class 6A and 4A championship games will be held at the University of Kansas' Memorial Stadium, while Russell High School will host teams competing for crowns in the two eight-man divisions.

K-State has hosted championship games the past four years since the KSHSAA voted in favor of football championships being played on a neutral site.

Moon said the University could consider the title games as a recruiting tool.

"This is one more way to get potential K-State students on campus," he said.

Last week was the finale of regular-season play for high-school football teams. Bi-district, regional and substate games will determine who will play at K-State. But K-State cannot promote the championship games because promotion would give the University an "unfair advantage."

"We organize it, but the people from the high school coaches' association actually run it," Moon said. "Each college would try to outdo the other ones if promotion was allowed. That keeps us from getting an edge."

Locations for each championship game are rotated annually. The sites, Moon said, were selected because of all-weather fields.

"These playing fields are generally chosen because of astroturf," he said. "This ensures that the games won't be cancelled — no matter what the weather brings."

Normal game-day operations will take place on Nov. 29, Moon said.

"The same people will be in charge of their individual areas," he said. "Other than that, we're not allowed to do much."

Colleges and high schools chosen to host the games must follow the rules set forth by a NCAA committee, he said.

After this week's playoff games are played, letters will be sent to regional victors explaining what will take place if they play in a championship game, Moon said. Games in 4A, 3A, 2A and Eight-Man I begin tonight with 6A, 5A and Eight-Man II games set for Friday.

Referee is correct

Editor,

Re: Tony Carbajo's article in the Nov. 10 Collegian ("Referee's call blemishes 'Cats' first-half defensive executution"). I was totally disgusted by the title and the contents of this article. I agree that the K-State defense played very well, not only in the first half but for the entire game. To criticize the official is unwarranted and unprofessional.

According to NCAA rules, a receiver need only have one foot down inbounds for a catch. Hart Lee Dykes clearly had one foot land in the end zone before going out of bounds. Field judge Terry Turlington at first ruled the pass incomplete and I thought to myself, "Great — we got a break." He then changed his call to a touchdown, which was the correct call. To chastise the man for changing a wrong call to the correct one shows a complete lack of class. The man earned a lot of my respect by changing his call. I wonder if Mr. Carbajo even saw the play based on the description in his article.

A couple of things must be remembered in regard to officials (and umpires): 1, a game cannot be played without them; and 2, they do not lose the games — players and coaches do.

'Huskers' I-back Kaelin earns conference's offensive honors

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Ken Kaelin, who gained 126 yards in 25 carries in Nebraska's come-from-behind 35-14 victory over Iowa State, was named the Big Eight's offensive player of the week.

Kaelin won in a split vote over Hart Lee Dykes of Oklahoma State, who caught seven passes for 121 yards and two touchdowns in the 23-3 victory over Kansas State.

Also nominated for the offensive award were Kansas wide receiver Willie Vaughn, Colorado fullback Anthony Weatherspoon, and Iowa State center Channon Mawdsley.

Beloit area seniors tour campus; alumni provide chance for visit

By The Collegian Staff

K-State alumni from the Beloit area are providing a chance for seniors from nine north-central Kansas high schools to visit the University today.

The Office of Admissions is coordinating Senior Day at K-State for students from Beloit, Tipton, Waconda East of Cawker City, Downs, Osborne, St. John's of Beloit, Jewell, Mankato and White Rock of Burr Oak high schools. Alumni are providing transportation for the students.

During Senior Day, students will visit three colleges or departments of their choice to learn more about their desired fields of study.

The program begins at 10 a.m. when the seniors will receive a welcoming speech from Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, and Steven Johnson, student body president and junior in agricultural economics. At 11 a.m., seniors will tour the campus. During a lunch provided in the Union, Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, will speak.

"It's great that the visitation program has mobilized," said Julie Schuler, counselor in preadmissions. "It's going full force. (University) President (Jon) Wefald has invited all high schools within a 100-mile radius to visit."

Bishops ask for meeting with pope on 'ill will' of American Catholics

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The head of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, warning of rising ill will between American Catholics and the Vatican, called Monday for Pope John Paul II to meet with the U.S. hierarchy before his American visit next year.

Bishop James Malone of Youngstown, Ohio, president of the organization, did not say exactly what the bishops would tell the pope, who plans to visit the South and West for a series of speeches and Masses in outdoor stadiums next September.

But he spoke soberly of "developing estrangement" between the Vatican and parts of the American church over such questions as dissent from high church authority.

The pope was cheered by millions during a triumphant tour of Eastern and Midwestern U.S. cities in October 1979.

"But no one who reads the newspapers of the past three years can be ignorant of a growing and dangerous disaffection of elements of the church in the United States from the Holy See," Malone said.

His speech opened the bishops' four-day annual meeting, during which the nearly 300 church leaders will go behind closed doors to discuss one matter that has led to public protests in Washington state — the Vatican's order that Seattle Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen give some of his authority to a Vatican-appointed auxiliary bishop because of complaints about Hunthausen's liberal views.

A number of bishops are known to be upset about the Vatican's treatment of a fellow bishop, but there is no indication yet whether the private Hunthausen meeting on Tuesday will lead to any public action or statement.

Feelings seemed to be softened at least slightly by a letter from the pope, read to the bishops on Monday by the papal representative to the United States, Archbishop Pio Laghi.

In numerous ways, John Paul said, "I have tried to be of service to you, my brother bishops in the United States, placing my full trust in you and counting on your collaboration."

Archbishop Rembert Weakland of Milwaukee, an influential liberal bishop who is among candidates to succeed Malone in elections on Tuesday, called the letter "a very positive gesture ... a sign of good will toward us in working out any difficulties that are there."

In the past year alone, unmentioned by Malone but suggested by his reference to stories that have been heavily covered in the secular press:

—The Vatican has revoked the church-theologian credentials of a prominent professor at Catholic University here because of views considered too liberal on sexual issues.

—Vatican pressure has led a Jesuit priest to resign from his order after he polled bishops on their views on celibacy and women's ordination.

—Another Jesuit has been told he would be expelled from the order if he spoke out, as he then did, against the Vatican's recent restatement of its views on the sinfulness of homosexuality.

Delegation instructs Chinese about U.S. financial system

By The Associated Press

PEKING — Communist China's top bankers, branching further into economic reform, met some of Wall Street's most powerful figures on Monday to seek advice over the complexities of raising enormous amounts of money through the sale of stocks and bonds.

"We have an opportunity to participate in an unprecedented event," said John J. Phelan Jr., chairman and chief executive officer of the New York Stock Exchange. "This is indeed a historic occasion."

Phelan is the leader of a U.S. delegation attending a four-day symposium at the invitation of the People's Bank of China.

The gathering in the monolithic Great Hall of the People in Peking — a stone's throw from Mao Tse-tung's tomb — mixed more than 200 baggy-clothed functionaries of China's central banking system with the pinstriped executives of such financial giants as Merrill Lynch & Co., First Boston Corp. and Drexel Burnham Lambert Inc.

Members of the 20-member delegation planned to brief the Chinese on such topics as U.S. financial institutions, capital markets and the history and operation of major world stock exchanges, including the role of brokers and government regulators.

The conference came against a background of experimental but highly publicized changes in China's centralized financial structure, which long has viewed banks as little more than mechanisms for accepting deposits and making loans.

In what would have been unthinkable during Mao's rule, the government recently gave banks more flexibility in raising money, sanctioned three tiny markets for limited trading in company stocks and bonds and made provisions for up to 10 more.

Even so, Chinese leaders have realized the reforms are woefully inadequate to supply the hundreds of billions of dollars' worth of investment needed to modernize the country.

China's urgency in improving its money-raising techniques has been compounded by a widely reported shortage of foreign exchange and a historic distrust of banks by the Chinese, mostly among the 800 million peasants who make up 80 percent of the population.

People's Bank Deputy Governor Liu Hongru, briefing the Americans on the first day of the symposium, gave a litany of bank problems ranging from indiscriminate loan-giving to gross inefficiency.

In a speech that several guests called unexpectedly candid, Liu said China wanted a sophisticated stock and bond market, competitive interest rates and a financial reporting system for evaluating the creditworthiness of companies.

"Stocks and bonds should be issued through banks, trust and investment companies or specialized financial institutions particularly set up for that purpose," Liu said.

For their part, the American speakers did not address the apparent contradiction of using capitalist-style money raising techniques in a socialist country, and expressed enthusiasm for the changes.

"Every year, high schools across the country graduate 700,000 functionally illiterate young people. And another 700,000 drop out every year," said David T. Kearns, chairman and chief executive officer of Xerox Corp., in a Kansas City Star article last October. "In 16 states, dropout rates range from 26 percent to 42 percent, and most big cities are at the high end of that."

The article said 30 percent of high-school graduates can't read effectively.

"People that are non-readers are reluctant to reveal themselves. A lot of people won't admit they need help," Hebert said. "Very few people will take (outside help) on their own. Their family or friends usually bring them here for help."

The Adult Learning Center, 2031 Casement Road, has been providing people with remedial learning assistance for 21 years. The center originated as a volunteer organization run by the American Association of University Women.

Funding from the state began in 1967, Herbert said. The state of Kansas funds 10 percent of the costs for the center, and federal funds provide the other 90 percent. The Manhattan school district provided the building on Casement Road in 1973 and continues to provide utilities.

Hebert said that of the nearly 4,500 illiterate adults in Manhattan, the center helps about 10 percent, which is roughly 350 adults each year.

This number may seem small, but the center's enrollment has risen considerably.

Hebert said 58 people were enrolled last year. This year, enrollment jumped to 133, a 129-percent increase. He said seven graduated from the center last year. This year, 17 graduated from the center.

The test for graduation, which is equivalent to receiving a high-school diploma, is based on five areas: writing, reading, social studies, math and science.

Hebert said the center offers two programs. The first is "Adult Basic Education," which helps with remedial learning skills. The other program, "English as a Second Language," helps foreigners learn the English language and adapt to the U.S. culture.

"Our main focus of these programs is to get people employed," he said. "One-third of the people we help are unemployed and looking for jobs."

Most of the people the center helps are marginally illiterate, and a large percent are high-school dropouts, he said. About half the people the center helps are between 16 and 24, but the oldest person helped was 72, Hebert said.

In Riley County, there are about 1,200 illiterate people between the age of 16 and 19 who don't have high-school diplomas, he said. There are about 5,400 over the age of 20 who are illiterate and without diplomas, he said.

The center has eight part-time workers and between 15 and 17 volunteers. One of the workers is a certified school teacher, Hebert said.

Two sets of books are used to teach the students. One set is based on information from the General Equivalency Diploma tests, which is what students must pass before graduating, Hebert said.

The center advertises its services through the local media. But Hebert said it's hard to get the word out when the people who need to be reached can't read the message.

"Our biggest problem is we reach the readers, but not the non-readers," he said.

Hebert said that for some foreign students, the center is a stepping stone to K-State. Many times, foreign students have to pass the GED before enrolling at K-State, he said.

"Many of the people we help get better jobs as a result of us," Hebert said.

President Reagan's Project Literacy U.S., a multimillion-dollar campaign to help combat adult illiteracy, is expected to have a powerful effect nationwide. ABC and PBS are widely publicizing this topic through various programs, Hebert said.

of financial considerations. A business owner currently operating in a self-standing structure or in a strip-style center will not realize the same profit margins as in the mall.

Although Dworkin would not give projections for increased sales rates in the mall, he said those increases will not be proportional to increased costs of operating in a mall setting.

"Some operations just aren't feasible from a sales function as to locate in a mall," Dworkin said.

He said local merchants, although they may not receive approval to locate in the facility, should investigate the possibility because of the impact the mall will have on the business community.

"The mall is going to become the retail experience for this city," he said. Dworkin said the majority of retail dollars in the community will be spent in the mall after it is in full operation.

"It just happens this way," Dworkin said.

But, he added, "that is not enough reason (for locating in the mall) if the retailer can't operate in the mall profitably."

He said that tenants locating in the mall will receive the concrete floor and metal studs placed in the floor in the configuration of the final floor design.

Dworkin said the architectural design and construction will be up to the store owner, contingent on the landlord's approval of the final plans.

Costs to the tenants, in addition to construction and inventory costs, will include all start-up costs, rents and other charges assessed to mall tenants, Dworkin said.

Among those costs are charges for maintenance of common areas not used by businesses; heating, ventilation and air conditioning costs of common areas; and advertising and promotional costs for the mall.

Dworkin also said regulations could include mandatory advertising by tenants in a landlord-sponsored medium, such as radio or newspaper inserts.

He said it will not be possible to cite rental costs per square foot due to the number of possible variances, such as profit margins for certain types of businesses. As an example, he said rental rates will be higher for a grocery store than a shoe store, due to differences in profit margins.

He also said the location of a business within the mall will also affect rental rates.

"It's extremely important for the landlord to control location of merchants in the mall," Dworkin said.

He said the first areas to be filled will be in the food court, followed by tenants of ready-to-wear merchandise and those requiring more than 3,000 square feet of floor space. The final leases, he said, will be those for specialty stores or those requiring fewer than 3,000 square feet.

thern Texas.

By contrast, cooler weather that moved into the Southeast merely ended what was the warmest November weekend on record for parts of Georgia. Savannah, Augusta and Columbus had three days of record highs in the 80s, peaking at 86 in Savannah.

A 13-year-old boy who went out to play late Friday or sometime Saturday was missing on the Fort Totten Indian Reservation in North Dakota, police dispatcher Bruno Cavanaugh said Monday. Up to 28 inches of snow fell on the area.

The storm deaths included two in Montana and one in Michigan in traffic accidents on slick roads, two canoeists drowned in 6-foot waves in Minnesota, and a North Dakota farmer who died walking home after getting stuck in snow.

Temperatures at 2 p.m. EST ranged from 5 degrees below zero at Bozeman, Mont., to 87 at Sarasota, Fla.

For Tuesday, snow was forecast from the lower Great Lakes across central and northern New England, with scattered snow over the northern Rockies and rain from southern New England across the Carolinas, the Ohio and Tennessee valleys, from Georgia across the lower Mississippi Valley and southeastern Texas.

Highs in the teens and 20s were predicted over northern Maine, Upper Michigan, Wisconsin, the upper Mississippi Valley, the northern Plains and Montana; in the 30s and 40s from central New England across New Jersey, the lower Great Lakes, the Ohio Valley, the central Mississippi Valley, from Nebraska across northern Texas, from New Mexico over Wyoming, over the Rockies and the northern Plateau; in the 70s from the South Carolina coast and Georgia across southern Louisiana; in the 70s and low 80s over southern California and the desert Southwest; and in the 80s across much of Florida.

after beginning at 32 F at 6 a.m. Temperatures last night and early this morning were expected to dip near 13.

In addition to the unseasonal temperatures, the Manhattan area received less than an inch of snow despite local forecasts earlier in the afternoon predicting up to three inches. The snow began as flurries before 11 a.m. and increased in intensity until stopping around 2 p.m. There were more flurries late Monday afternoon and early in the evening.

Heathfield predicts more light snow for Wednesday before the second cold front plunges the evening temperatures back into the low teens. Highs today and Wednesday are expected to be in the upper 20s to lower 30s.

Based on a 90-day forecast, Heathfield said precipitation for this winter will be above normal and temperatures should be near normal.

"You can usually expect your coldest temperatures in January, climatologically speaking," he said.

Council reduces cost of Christmas ski trip

By The Collegian Staff

In an effort to generate more student interest, the Union Program Council has reduced the fee on its annual Christmas break trip.

This year's intersession trip will be Jan. 3-10 at Steamboat Sprngs, Colo. Because of slow student response, the cost of the trip has been reduced from $316 to $257 for people needing to rent ski equipment and from $284 to $225 for those with their own equipment.

Cindy Lunsford, UPC Travel Committee chairwoman and senior in business education, said students' lack of money is a major factor in the small number of reservations for this year's ski trip. Lunsford said another reason for the small turnout was competition from other off-campus sponsored trips.

UPC has altered its trip so that participants will have to provide their own transportation, Lunsford said. Previously, the round trip motor coach transportation was included in the trip's cost. The price difference reflects the trip's change of plans.

diences to turn around and tell the person behind them that 'I am somebody,'" Miller said. "I then ask the people if they are telling that person or asking that person. Frequently, we are embarrassed because we are afraid to get our ego up or be too flashy and not do this or that.

"We spend so much time talking about what we cannot do (that) we do not have enough time to talk about what we can do. We need to be constantly practicing positive experiences instead of redefining negative experiences."

Miller said he has had many gratifying experiences from speaking, which has made him believe that he has made a difference in the life of some people.

One experience was when he gave a speech about a world record-holder pole vaulter who had a terrible accident and is now a quadriplegic. A woman, who's daughter had been in a car accident, came up to him crying afterward and said the former pole vaulter was her daughter's therapist in Seattle.

"You see, the thing that people have a hard time with and think is hoky, is that I really believe what I say," Miller said. "I believe that the human spirit, the thing that you feel, is an indomitable, uncontained and virtually unlimited spirit. We can be better than we ever thought possible and we all have tremendous capacity."

Merchants seek solutions to ending violence

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

There are no easy solutions to stopping another Aggieville disturbance, but it is essential to the community to see the violence end, said merchants gathered Tuesday at Mr.K's.

About 50 people met during the lunch hour to offer solutions for quelling damage to their property and the reputation of Manhattan.

"This isn't a time to rehash what happened; it is a time for solutions," said Jim Schottler, president of the Aggieville Merchants Association and chairman of the meeting. "We need to come up with ideas."

The proposals for solving the problems varied, but the central theme of the meeting was to get tough and not let crowd violence happen again.

Solutions offered at the meeting included the blockading of streets, moving the game to Kansas City or Topeka and expelling students arrested in Aggieville for violent actions.

"They would never allow this in Lawrence," said Chris Backman, owner of Krazy Kris's.

"If a student is involved in the riot and arrested, then he is out of school — period," he said. "I admit this is severe, but there are a lot of parents paying a lot money to have their kids get a good education."

Backman said he believed K-State students constituted only a small percentage of the crowd involved in the disturbance but added that those causing the damage should be punished.

Solutions were also offered toward tackling the problem which many believed was the central factor in the disturbances — alcohol consumption.

Backman suggested that alcoholic beverages should not be allowed in the streets, emphasizing the fact that it is illegal to have liquor in the streets every day. He said that aspect seems to be overlooked after the University of Kansas-K-State football game.

Schlotter said one suggestion he received called for the posting of city ordinances on signs which would clearly state the illegality of public consumption of alcohol.

"There were a lot of people down here that didn't realize it was against the law to walk down the street with a beer in their hand," he said.

Chuck Jackson, owner of Chuck's Car Wash, said he believes the lack of prosecution of individuals arrested in the 1984 disturbance needs to be reversed.

"I think the county attorney needs to be asked, 'Are you going to prosecute to the fullest?'"

"We need to go to the judge and ask, 'Mr. Judge, are you going to give them the maximum fines and the maximum jail terms?'" he said.

Jackson said he also believed an information campaign in area papers and University publications, telling students of the consequences of their actions, would be effective.

Cadets honor veterans in memorial ceremony

By The Collegian Staff

University ROTC cadets honored American war veterans, living and dead, in a joint retreat ceremony as part of their Veterans Day observances Tuesday.

The ceremony began at 5 p.m. with the formal reporting procedures of both the Army and Air Force ROTCs on the front lawn of Anderson Hall.

During the 10-minute ceremony, "Taps" was played while lowering the flag above Anderson and the retiring of the colors.

Lori Baier, senior in mathematics and Air Force cadet commander, directed the service by giving the commands to the assembled cadets.

She said the ceremony's purpose was to "remember and honor all the people who have served this country in the armed forces.

"It's important to remember that veterans are both living and dead," she said. "There are more veterans than those who died in wars."

In honor of students who died in past wars, wreaths were placed by the cadets at three campus memorials. The wreaths were placed simultaneously at war memorials located in Danforth Chapel, the Union and the Military Science Building at 7 a.m. on Tuesday.

The ceremony was sponsored by the K-State Army and Air Force ROTCs. The planning of the ceremonies is alternated by the two branches each year, with the Air Force in charge this year.

Kidnapped Frenchmen back home

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Two Frenchmen freed by Shiite Moslem kidnappers after months of captivity in Lebanon came home Tuesday and were greeted by Premier Jacques Chirac, who thanked Syria for helping arrange the release.

Camille Sontag, 85, and Marcel Coudari, 54, were released in west Beirut Monday night and turned over to French envoys in Damascus, Syria, less than 12 hours later.

When they arrived at Orly airport outside Paris, Chirac thanked Syria, Saudia Arabia and Algeria for helping arrange the release of the aptives.

Coudari, when asked if he had news of other French hostages, replied: "No. But I can tell you that things will happen soon." Asked if he was certain, Coudari said: "Well, yes, more or less, more or less."

He told reporters, citing "a pretty official source," that French hostage Michel Seurat apparently had died of natural causes. The pro-Iranian Shiite Moslem group Islamic Jihad announced March 5 that he had been killed.

Sontag came down the steps of the French jet into the arms of his 84-year-old wife, and they hugged and kissed as Chirac beamed. Blanche Sontag then fumbled in her handbag and handed a small object to her husband — apparently a replacement for the hearing aid broken during his abduction.

Earlier in Damascus, both men looked well after their ordeal, but the white-haired Sontag appeared frail and nervous. He was supported by two burly Syrian officials when he walked into a chandeliered room in the Syrian Foreign Ministry for Tuesday's handover formalities.

Coudari, a businessman, chain-smoked American cigarettes as he and Sontag, a retired auto dealer, waited for more than an hour in an anteroom, sipping thick Arabic coffee from small blue cups.

He said Sontag was held in an underground prison in south Beirut with five other Western captives.

Task force members still question possible uses for athletic fee funds

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

It may be called a non-revenue athletic fee, but that is no guarantee it will be spent as such, some members of the Athletic Fee Task Force said Tuesday.

Once again, task force members raised questions as to how money generated from an athletic fee would be spent by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"Let's not kid ourselves. If we think we're going to put the athletic department over a barrel and tell them to spend the money in such and such a way, we're wrong," said Bill Majerus, task force member and graduate in agronomy.

"I'm not saying they're a bunch of crooks," Majerus said. "But all we're doing by saying that it's non-revenue is making ourselves feel good.

"We're not just playing with our money; we're playing with the students' money," he said. "And it won't take long for them to figure out what's going down."

Doug Folk, task force chairman and junior in electrical engineering, said the athletic department currently takes the money needed for football and men's basketball, then distributes the remaining funds to the non-revenue sports.

Because of that, Majerus argued, the athletic fee would basically be helping out the revenue sports in the long run.

Folk disagreed.

"When this fee comes in, why would they pull money out to fund football and basketball, which get first crack at it anyway?" he said. "I can't see them doing that, and I don't think that's their intention.

"I don't see a problem with calling it a non-revenue sports fee, because that's where our money is going," Folk said.

"If that means that the athletic department pulls some of their money out (of non-revenue sports funding), then that's what it means, and everybody understands that."

Majerus said while the task force could try to put stipulations on the money generated from a student athletic fee, it could not put restrictions on the athletic department's money.

"You can't say, 'If you want our money, you've got to spend your money this way,'" Majerus said.

"I think there's a good intention where the money's going to go," said Roger Haymaker, task force member and junior in business administration.

"If we're going to take the students' money, we've got to make sure their money is spent wisely," Majerus said. "If we can't say that, we have no right taking their money."

Folk said the task force was going to have to trust the athletic department's judgment.

"We can't spend 24 hours a day watching over them," he said. "There has to be a point where you draw the line."

Majerus said he was afraid the task force may be "insulting the students' intelligence by tacking on another fee."

Steering committee for museum discusses location, cost estimates

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

Feasibility studies are underway for a permanent campus art museum and gallery at the University.

"K-State is one of only two universities in the state without an art gallery and is the only Big Eight school without one," said Ruth Ann Wefald, member of the art museum steering committee.

Faculty, students, alumni and interested community members have combined efforts to examine the possibilities for a museum to provide an area large enough to display the University's current collection of about 1,000 art works.

Because there is currently no large permanent exhibit area, pieces from the collection have been scattered throughout campus buildings and offices, and some works have been put into storage.

The University collection includes graphic art, paintings, sculpture, ceramics, textiles and photography. Works by Henri Matisse and Salvador Dali are included, as well as works by three well-known Midwest artists, Thomas Hart Benton, John Steuart Curry and Grant Wood. Works by Gordon Parks, an internationally renowned photographer, are also represented.

Many people who see these art works daily are not aware of their worth, said Sally Traeger, senior in marketing and steering committee member.

A permanent art gallery would provide a place where nearly all of the University's collection could be on exhibit, she said, which could heighten peoples' appreciation of these art works.

Wefald was chairwoman of the first steering committee meeting, and a program was presented by committee members George Miller, vice president for administration and finance; W. Lawrence Garvin, director of facilities planning; Jessica Reichman, University art curator; and Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art.

The program included background information on the University's art collection, presentation of a design for the proposed structure, a site analysis for the structure, a cost estimate and an estimate of available financial support for the program, Traeger said.

Three locations were proposed as sites for the museum and gallery: an addition to the Union, a McCain Auditorium addition and a free-standing structure east of McCain.

These sites were suggested because they met necessary criteria for the museum and gallery to be as useful and

Calls link Contra arms to officer

WASHINGTON — Telephone calls from a Salvadoran safehouse used in secret arms shipments to Nicaraguan Contra rebels were made to a former Pentagon officer's company, which flew U.S. non-lethal supplies to the rebels, according to documents.

The calls to the office and house of Richard B. Gadd of Vienna, Va., represent an apparent new link between official U.S. government "humanitarian" aid for the Contras and the secret weapons supply operation that came to light Oct. 5 when an American-manned C-123K cargo plane was shot down over southern Nicaragua.

Gadd, a former Air Force lieutenant colonel, is president of AIRMACH, Inc., a company that received a State Department contract to fly non-lethal supplies to Contra rebels although it has no planes registered to it and has no publicly listed telephone number.

Government sources and a secretary who answered calls to one number appearing on the phone bill confirmed that the number belonged to AIRMACH, but Gadd did not respond to repeated requests for comment on his role with the Contras.

Calls also were made to a telephone number at a house in Vienna that Gadd listed as his residence in corporate records. It is now answered by a tape-recording saying the number is not in service.

Robert Duemling, who ran the special State Department office that disbursed $27 million in non-lethal aid to the rebels, refused to identify any of the five concerns hired to fly the supplies but said the carriers were examined for reliability before contracts were granted.

He said some of the air freight companies leased airplanes and hired crews for the Contra aid flights, which he said had ended by late spring.

The General Accounting Office, Congress' investigative arm, has criticized management of the $27 million, saying that more than half the money could not be tracked.

The CIA and the Reagan administration have denied involvement with the Oct. 5 C-123K flight that left two Americans dead and one, Eugene Hasenfus, captured in Nicaragua. Hasenfus has said the operation was directed by two Cuban-Americans he claimed worked for the CIA.

Indian skull pulled off auction list

LITTLE ROCK, Ark.— An Indian skull that was scheduled to be auctioned Tuesday as part of a large artifact collection was removed from the sale list after an Indian group complained.

"It is definitely pulled and will not be sold," said Shirley Martin of Dalton Dailey and Associates, an auctioneering firm. The company was hired to sell the Indian artifact collection of Sam Spikes, 51, a Little Rock insurance agent who pleaded guilty last month to cocaine distribution.

"Particularly, what caught us was the idea that somebody was going to sell a skull," Paul Austin, director of the American Indian Center of Arkansas, said Monday. "It looks like most of the stuff this guy's got is from a grave."

Dan Littlefield, director of the American Native Press Archives at the University of Arkansas, said Arkansas has no laws against disturbing Indian burial sites.

House member asks vote recount

TOPEKA — A two-term member of the Kansas House who was defeated by 25 votes in the Nov. 4 general election has asked for a recount in the two northeast Kansas counties that are a part of his district.

Rep. Burt DeBaun, R-Osage City, asked for the recounts in his apparently unsuccessful race against Carbondale Democrat Elaine Wells. Final unofficial returns showed Ms. Wells edging DeBaun by a vote of 3,836 to 3,811.

DeBaun, who posted bonds totaling $700 Monday with election officials in Lyon and Osage counties, today said he has no real suspicions about the results but thinks a recount is a good procedure in close races.

"I think most of us, at least those of us on the losing side, would feel much better with a recount," DeBaun said.

Lyon County Clerk Wanita Werner said DeBaun filed a $300 campaign check with his request for a recount. She said a specially appointed three-member panel would begin recounting ballots in her county Wednesday afternoon.

Virginia Kersten, Osage County clerk, said a recount was scheduled there for Thursday morning after DeBaun posted a $400 campaign check.

Vote totals after last week's canvass showed DeBaun beating Ms. Wells 915-716 in Lyon County but losing to Ms. Wells 3,060 to 2,896 in Osage county. If last week's results are overturned, the counties will have to pay for the special counting boards but if the returns are upheld, DeBaun will sacrifice the amounts he placed on deposit.

DeBaun said he plans to be on hand when the votes are recounted. If DeBaun is successful, the Democrats' gain in the House as a result of the election this year would be cut to one seat.

FBI still trying to identify suspect

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A man whose identity is still a mystery to authorities more than five months after his arrest for bank robbery has been found incompetent to stand trial and sent back to a federal prison hospital.

The man is charged with bank robbery as James Alex Coleman — the name he gave authorities when he was arrested May 29, only minutes after the robbery of the United Missouri Bank Northland.

Officials say the name didn't check out, and the man has been uncommunicative at the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo. On the basis of reports from doctors, U.S. District Judge Howard Sachs ruled on Monday he is not competent to be tried.

Sachs ordered him returned to the prison hospital for up to four months to see if he becomes competent. If officials there conclude he still can't be tried, and the government can't prove him to be a danger to people or property, he will have to be released on supervised probation.

Meanwhile, the FBI is continuing efforts to identify the man.

"We're hoping to find where he is from so maybe he can get into a state hospital and not just get dumped on the streets," said Robert Novotny, an FBI agent who has worked on the case.

Aquino praises Japan while garnering aid

By The Associated Press

TOKYO — Philippine President Corazon Aquino praised Japan on Tuesday as an inspiration and partner in rebuilding her nation's economy, which she said was left "broken at the bottom of the pile" by the 20-year rule of Ferdinand E. Marcos.

Expressing optimism for her country, she said: "My presidency runs until 1992 and in that time I have every expectation that I will oversee the same concerted burst of directed national energy that did so much for Japan."

In the 19th century, when other Asian countries were colonies of Western nations, and again after World War II, Japan "showed what an Asian nation could do given the will and a wise leadership," Aquino said at a state banquet.

"Now Japan, I am happy to note, stands not only as an inspiration but as a helpmate in our effort to recover." She gestured with her glass to Emperor Hirohito, 85, on her left, and his son Crown Prince Akihito on her right.

At a reception with legislators earlier, she said: "We need outright aid...but more importantly we need Japan's expression of faith in the promise of Philippine progress."

Halfway through her four-day visit to Japan, Aquino has gained the public support of Japanese leaders, a new loan commitment from the government and pledges of more private investment. It is her third trip abroad since assuming power when a military-civilian revolt drove Marcos into exile last February.

Dole speculates on bid for presidency

Minority leader may relinquish post

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Kansas Sen. Bob Dole says it's possible he might relinquish his Republican leadership position, maybe even his Senate seat, if he becomes a top contender for the 1988 presidential nomination.

"That's a remote option, but you get to the point where if you're missing a lot of action that affects your state then you have to make a choice," Dole said in an interview last week.

"I guess you have to make a judgment whether at that point you can be a senator and a candidate. Now I'm a long way from that point. I may never reach tat point."

Although stung by the Democratic takeover of the Senate in last week's election, Dole says he takes some comfort that a Republican governor was elected in Kansas. That means a Republican would appoint his replacement if he resigned to run full-time for the presidency. A Democrat has held the statehouse for eight years.

Dole's statements appear to reflect a change of view on what it might take to succeed in a presidential bid. In the past, Dole has maintained that he saw no problems in serving as majority leader while trying to run for president.

His predecessor as majority leader and another contender for the GOP presidential nomination, Howard Baker of Tennessee, believed just the opposite. He left office in 1984, saying it was a full-time job to pursue the presidency.

Dole, who has yet to make a formal announcement of a presidential bid although he does nothing to hide his ambitions for the office, says he forsees few problems in serving as Senate minority leader while preparing for the early state contests in the presidential nominating process.

"Not much happens around here in January or February," he quips.

The current calender places the Iowa caucuses on Feb. 15, 1988 and the New Hampshire primary eight days later. Fourteen states, mostly in the South, plan primaries on March 8, known in political circles as "Super Tuesday."

If he became a leading presidential contender, Dole says, his first decision would be whether to keep his leadership position.

"You just have to wait and see what develops, which is the best forum. Whether it's being out in Cedar Rapids or being on the Senate floor," he says. "There's no mystery about it, you just have to be honest with yourself at some time and say, 'I'm not doing my job.'"

At least for now, Dole contends that his presidential chances have not been hurt by the midterm elections which transformed him into the Senate leader of the minority party in the 100th Congress.

Some people, including his colleague Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., contends the minority leader's position could even help Dole.

"It leaves him more time to campaign," she says. "It gives him still the ability as minority leader to speak out on issues and be visible on television...without the responsibility of setting the agenda or having to be a cheerleader, so to speak."

Until the Congress convenes in January, Dole says he plans to concentrate on fund raising and "visiting one-on-one with a lot of key people around the country" about a presidential campaign.

His goal is to have at least $1 million on hand in January in his political action committee, Campaign America, which has financed his travels and contributed to other candidates. His re-election organization has about $2 million left after this year's campaign.

"So I'll probably start off in as good as shape as anyone as far as finances," Dole says. "We're doing a lot of work. I think we're ahead of everybody as far as organization except Bush. I made a commitment to myself that I wasn't going to get involved in an amateur hour operation.

Choir accepts European tour invitation

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas State Choir has been invited to tour Switzerland and Italy this summer, with performances scheduled in four major cities, said Rod Walker, professor of music and Kansas State Choir conductor.

In August, the mayor of Montreux, Switzerland, extended an invitation to Walker and his choir, asking them to perform in his city this summer, he said.

The choir will leave for Montreux May 21 and will return June 1.

"This tour includes seven days in Switzerland, in the cities of Montreux, St. Moritz and Lucerne, and three days in Lugano, Italy," said Terry Pearson, travel agent for the tour.

The choir will perform concerts in each of these major cities, but there will be plenty of time for members to see the sights, he said.

This is not the first time the choir has traveled overseas, said Robert Clasen, senior in journalism and mass communications and choir member.

"I've been on two previous European tours with the choir — to England, Wales and Ireland in '83, and to Austria and Germany in '85," Clasen said.

Double-decker bus tours have become a tradition on K-State Choir tours, he said.

"One of the best parts of these trips is riding on the double-deckers," he said. "Not only can the choir members view the sights, but they also have a lot of fun, and get to know each other better."

Choir members also enjoy singing in the European churches and cathedrals, Clasen said.

"We try to sing at least one song in each of the cathedrals we visit," he said, "which is always a neat experience."

These choir tours also allow members to learn a lot about other cultures.

"On past overseas tours, we've had the opportunity to stay with families — rather than in hotels — for several nights," he said. "Even though a German family I stayed with didn't speak much English, we were able to understand each other. They were very hospitable."

Choir members will raise their own funds to pay for the trip, however, the group has held several fund-raisers to help members with this expense.

In November and December, the choir provides members of the Manhattan community with "Singing Christmas Cards." For a small fee, people may order a quartet, octet or a larger group to sing selected Christmas carols at meetings, parties and other functions.

The choir will also present its Serenade IV concert in the spring. This concert will feature a salute to Gershwin, the Carpenters and the Great White Way, and its proceeds will help choir members cover tour expenses.

Faculty Senate applauds letter on disturbance

By AMY GREENE
Collegian Reporter

Contents of a letter to be sent by Student Senate to all Kansas newspapers were disclosed to Faculty Senate Tuesday.

The letter concerns publicity regarding the Oct. 18 Aggieville disturbance following the K-State-University of Kansas football game.

After being proposed and signed by Student Senate at its last meeting, the letter was read to Faculty Senate by Sally Traeger, Student Senate chairwoman and senior in marketing.

The letter said the actions of a few people involved in the disturbance should not be blamed on all students. The blame put on the K-State students was exaggerated, the letter said.

During the reading of the letter, Traeger said there was more publicity on the anticipated "riot" than the football game itself.

The letter addressed the K-Staters involved in the disturbance and expressed Student Senate's disappointment and disgust.

Student Senate asked those who aggravated the situation not to feel free to come to the University community if damage to property, injury and damage to the University and student body must occur.

"The purpose of the letter is to make a stand on a misconception and not to be counterproductive," Traeger said.

She said letters were being sent in by alumni, saying they would not give any money because of their disappointment in the University and student body.

Traeger said the letter is not the last step in solving the problem, adding there will be follow-up meetings concerning the situation.

Faculty Senate members responded to the reading with applause, but did not discuss or act on the letter.

In other action, curriculum changes were approved for the Departments of Civil Engineering, and Electrical and Computer Engineering.

The change would require students in those departments to take a writing course for engineers, instead of English Composition II.

Memorial service to honor late grain science researcher

A memorial service to honor Morteza Maleki, research associate in grain science and industry, will be held from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. Thursday in the International Student Union.

Guest speaker at the service will be Charles W. Deyoe, professor in grain science and industry.

The service is being planned by Maleki's family and colleagues from the Department of Grain Science.

He held degrees from Tehran University, Iran, University of California-Davis and University of Illinois.

Maleki authored two books and published more than 30 scientific articles in the food science field.

He died Saturday at a Kansas City hospital.

Europe joins to fight state-supported terror

Countries in the European Economic Community are uniting in an effort to fight terrorism.

All members of the Common Market except Greece on Monday agreed to ban arms sales, end high-level official visits and increase surveillance of Syrian missions and operations of Syrian airlines.

Sanctions were invoked against Syria because Syria was believed to be involved in an attempt to smuggle a bomb onto an Israeli airliner at Heathrow Airport in London last spring. The incident led to Britain breaking ties with Syria last month.

Greece did not participate in the sanctions because the government is not convinced Syria was involved in the incident. However, Greece did not object to the other countries' action.

The United States and Canada have also shown their objections to Syrian involvement in terrorism by withdrawing ambassadors from Syria after Britain ended Syrian ties.

In a statement issued after the meeting Monday, the Common Market said, "Our actions have a specific purpose. We look to the Syrian authorities for a constructive response."

As long as Syria, or any other country, is thought to be involved in terrorism, Common Market nations and the United States should expect a response of an effort to stop Syrians from participating in terrorism.

If the country has not been involved in terrorism, it should enforce stricter control of its suspect citizens to signal the world that it does not support violence.

As long as terrorism continues to be a serious threat to citizens of peaceful nations, the threatened countries should united and encourage each other's efforts.

U.S. trade with Iran may shake up Shultz

Rumors are flying hot and heavy around Washington, D.C. A rumored arms deal with Iran to secure the release of American hostage David Jacobsen is shaking up the Reagan administration. It has also been rumored that Secretary of State George Shultz may resign because of this situation.

This covert arms deal would contradict the public position of the administration, whose policy is not to negotiate with terrorists. Giving in would doom the government to repeated demands by would-be terrorists.

Shultz has been adamantly opposed to deals with Iran. He has spent much time and effort to get other countries to stop supplying arms to this region. He also dislikes Iran's role in international state-sponsored terrorism and warns that any negotiations with terrorists would be a drastic mistake.

The arms deal allegedly took place with the help of Israel. The Israeli government has long been engaged in the sale of weapons to Iran during that country's six-year war with Iraq. Many of these weapons were given to Israel by the United States in the form of military aid.

Shultz's resignation will be the likely result if there in fact was a deal to send arms to Iran. His stand on this issue is very clear. But who will they get to replace him? It would have to be someone who doesn't mind saying one thing and doing another. Shultz is standing by his principles and should be commended for it.

Israel should abolish secret detainment law

Israel acknowledged Sunday that it was holding former nuclear plant technician Mordechai Vanunu. Vanunu vanished mysteriously from London after an interview with the London Times in which he revealed details of Israel's top-secret nuclear bomb program.

The Israeli government issued a statement denying it kidnapped Vanunu or that it sought approval from British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher for a plan to kidnap Vanunu.

The statement said, "There is...no basis to the report that (former Israeli Prime Minister Shimon) Peres contacted Mrs. Thatcher in order to inform her about something that never took place." Still, the statement would not specify how Israel got Vanunu out of Britain and back to Israel.

Under Israel's strict security laws, Vanunu can be held indefinitely and tried secretly if the defense minister deems such measures beneficial to state security. Despite the serious nature of the charges against Vanunu, a fair, public and speedy trial should not be denied.

Israel has a reputation for denying the right to due process — a fact that has caused some debate within the Israeli government. According to official sources, the government has been divided between officials who contend Israel would be acknowledging the validity of Vanunu's statements if his arrest became public knowledge, and those who argue that the country's already poor human rights record would be subjected to further damage by holding Vanunu secretly.

Israel has made the right decision in making its detainment of Vanunu public. Next, the Israeli government can do away with the secret detainment laws that violate a person's right to a public trial, as well as the laws which make it possible to detain a suspect indefinitely.

Then, perhaps Israel can claim credibly it is concerned with human rights.

Take time to view Mother Nature

Collegian Columnist

A transformation is taking place.

For the first time this year, the Earth will shed its brightly colored garments of fall and adorn itself with winter white.

This unheralded event is an annual occasion deserving much notoriety. Once each year humans have the privilege of observing Mother Nature's venture into designing fall fashions.

Most people don't understand why this natural transformation is so earthshaking (pardon the pun). If they don't notice the change this year, they claim they can always catch the transition next year, or the year after that.

Moreover, they can't see the significance of a bunch of leaves changing colors or some pine needles dropping off. Besides, they ask, who has the time to relax in an easy chair and watch nature crawl by? It's not worth their time to appreciate Mother Nature's handiwork.

I take issue with this attitude for several reasons. The fact that the turning of the leaves occurs once a year is all the more reason to observe it. Each year brings a different array of colors.

One year Mother Nature may emphasize vibrant oranges, reds and yellows with golden highlights. Another year she may use more subdued hues and include caramel and beige colors.

As to the importance of the seasonal changes, there are two schools of thought. First is the symbolic meaning. One could say the Earth is going to take an extended nap before rising in the spring rejuvenated.

From a practical standpoint, visible seasonal changes are the ideal way to warn people of approaching variances in the weather. Once the leaves begin to turn, people know that's the signal to dig out the long underwear and parkas.

But these reasons are peripheral (one colleague of mine would say "fluffy"). My main concern is with the idea that people don't have the time to observe these changes.

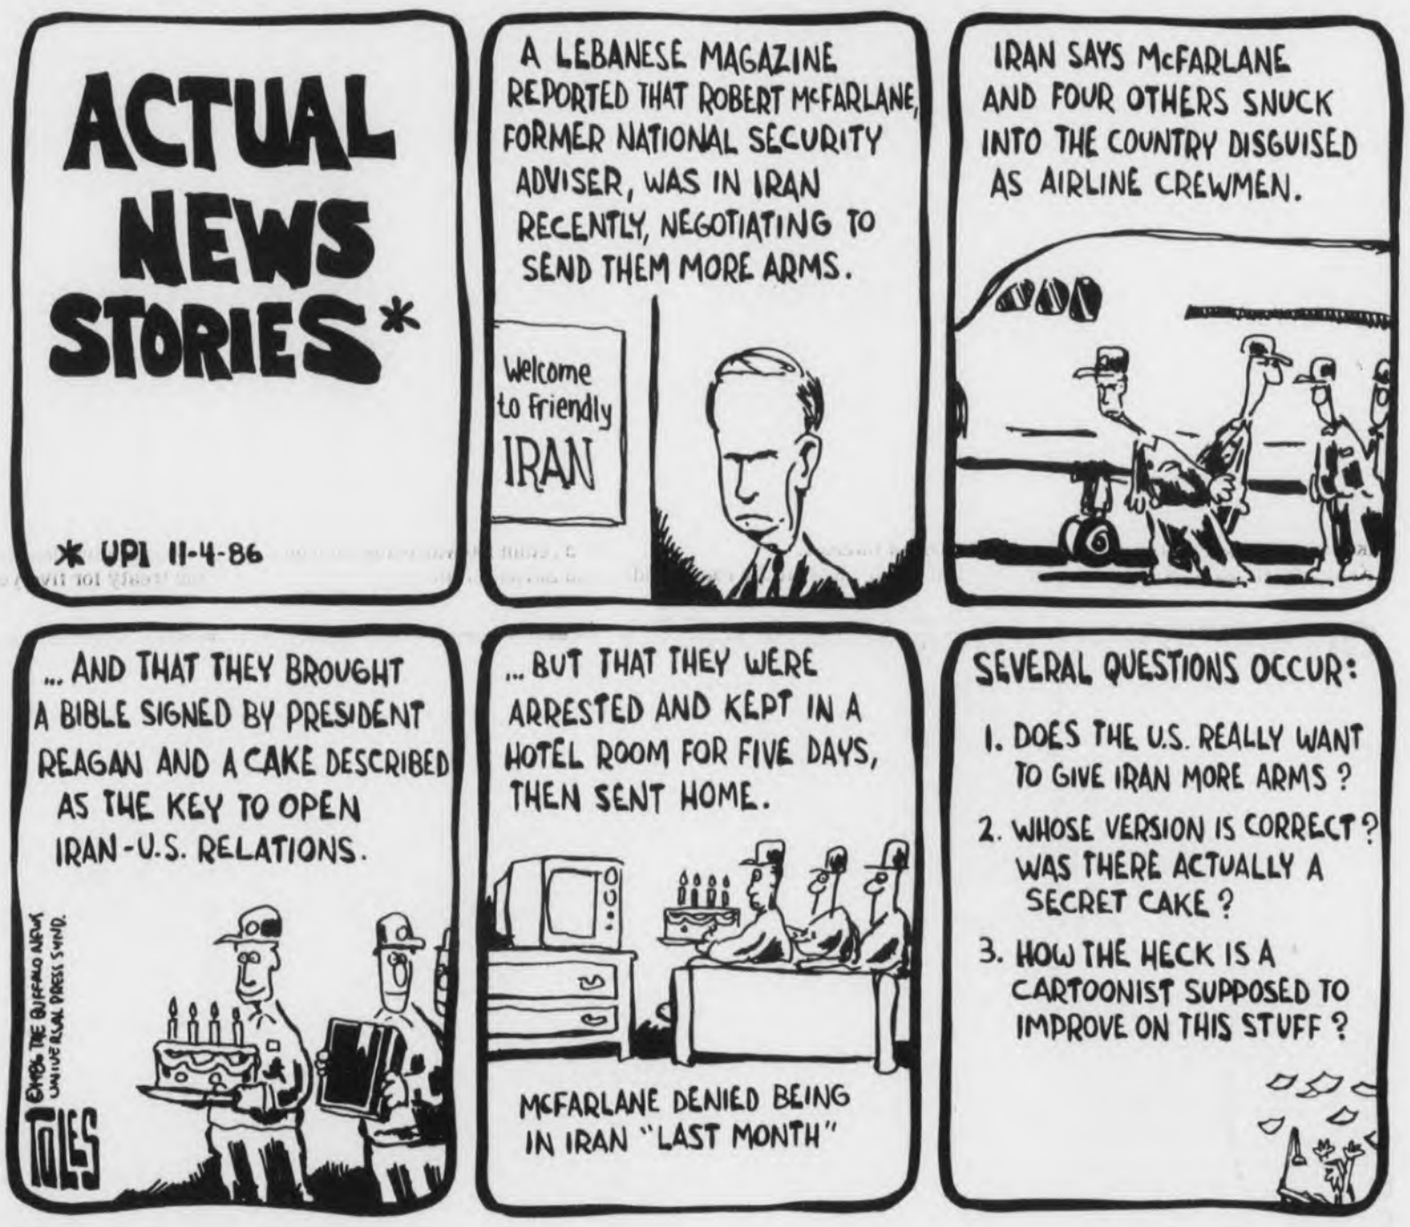
How much time would it take to look at the trees and note the leaves' varigated colors?

I'm not talking about going on a nature hike at Tuttle Creek Reservoir or a biology field trip. I'm talking about observing the trees while walking to class or driving home to eat lunch.

Unless a person is wearing a neck brace, it would take very little effort to cock his head up or cast his eyes heavenward to catch a glimpse of the tree tops. Furthermore, most people are coordinated enough that they can walk, look and think at the same time (well, at least walk and look).

If a person is driving a car or riding a bicycle, he can use his peripheral vision to view the trees and other plant life. This might be a problem for nearsighted humans lucky enough to wear glasses, but they can at least have a colorful, if somewhat blurry, picture.

In fact, I don't think there is a valid excuse for ignoring Mother Nature in her fine array. This can only mean one thing — people don't care enough about Mother Nature to take the time to notice her.



It's not people's apathy toward the changing of the seasons that bothers me, but the idea that nature isn't worth enough to take the time to observe her.

If the mother of all living things isn't worthy of people's precious time, what is? Films that often portray a fantasy world full of heroes and monsters? A weekend exploring the unrealistic and superficial world of the Aggieville bars?

Because of the increasing popularity of the movies and the taverns, one can only conclude that these material forms of entertainment are highly valued by the general public. Although there is no way to measure people's appreciation of Mother Nature in all her glory, I would contend it is fairly low.

If artificial objects are more valuable than real objects, what does that say about our society? Not much, except that we live in an artificial world full of artificial values.

There is no easy way to correct this, but one can start by appreciating life itself. Once a person notices Mother Nature in all her glory, one can begin to understand the forces at work in life. Then individuals can begin to value the real as opposed to the artificial.

Steel shot not safe

Editor,

Re: The article, "A Fowl Affair," in the Nov. 5 Collegian.

In the article, Mike Keehn, graduate student in pre-medicine, stated that the steel shot law was a "good idea," and that, "it's safe for us and for them. If they get wounded, they won't die of lead poisoning." This statement lead me to believe that ducks die from lead poisoning "after" they have been wounded. Waterfowl die from lead poisoning due to ingestion of lead shot pellets. Lead pellets accumulate in soils and marsh sediments where waterfowl and waterfowl hunters frequent. These pellets are picked up by feeding waterfowl and eaten. There is a good article by Marvin Kraft of the Kansas Fish and Game Commission titled "Lead Poisoning — Are We Wasting Our Waterfowl?" This article will clear up any misconceptions about lead poisoning.

I also wanted to ask Keehn about his hunting ethics. Is hunting waterfowl from a truck good sportsmanship? I was always led to believe that part of hunting was the thrill and chance of the act itself. In my opinion, hunting from a truck is poor sportsmanship and nothing more than an unlawful road hunt. If you can't take the cold, stay home.

Commending police

Editor,

The "boys in blue," our police force, are often the butt of jokes and have to suffer a great deal of negative criticism. I think it is time someone spoke up for them.

Last week, during one of our dreary, rainy days, I parked, left my car hurriedly and dashed for McCain — not realizing I had left the lights on. About an hour later I was called by the KSU Police to tell me I had forgotten to turn off the lights. With my car battery it is a serious matter, and I was very grateful.

This morning one of my students was asking the name of the Abilene newspaper because a member of the Abilene police force had stopped on the highway to change a tire for her.

I am firmly convinced that these two examples are much more representative of the actions and attitudes of our police force. So the next time you grumble about a ticket or moving violation, try to remember the positive — not the negative.

Halls need policy

Editor,

I have a disorder which afflicts one out of every 100 people. I am not dying. As a matter of fact, the disorder itself is seldom a cause of death. It is controllable yet rarely can be cured. I have epilepsy.

Although doctors have informed me that this is not necessary, at Moore Hall, where I live, it is mandatory to take an ambulance to Lafene Student Health Center following a seizure. I have surrounded myself with close friends that know first aid for seizures and are even willing to transport me. But, according to the assistant director of housing, "liability" is the reason for requesting a glorified taxi.

Currently, there is no housing policy for people with epilepsy. The automatic ambulance call is merely a verbal "decision." I resent the fact that, due to insensitivity of housing administration, my privacy has been invaded by being carted out in full view of other residents.

Not all universities are as insensitive as K-State. Wichita State University, for example, has a rational policy. There, the primary responsibility is directed to the university police, who are all educated about epilepsy and evaluate each incident to see if an ambulance is necessary.

During the past two months, I have tried to introduce a policy incorporating residence hall staff education, including first aid for seizures, and alternative transportation methods. I contacted the director and assistant director of housing and director of student services. Each gave me a different procedure to implement a policy of this type. My feeling was that none wanted to take responsibility for implementing a policy. Furthermore, I was told there was no reason for a policy because I graduate in December. I also contacted the University attorney and director of Lafene. Both felt there was need for a policy but were reluctant to give me further direction.

It is my understanding that under President Wefald's administration, K-State staff are to assist in hearing student concerns. All I got was a stonewall until I contacted Gretchen Holden, director of physically limited students. This contact was done much against my desire because I am not and never have been considered physically limited. But, within 45 minutes, she scheduled a meeting that I have been trying to do for two months.

Because I am graduating, a policy probably will not affect me, but I want to ensure that others with epilepsy living in K-State residence halls are not put through the monetary loss for ambulance costs and tremendous humiliation I've been subjected to for five years.

Lava Lite recaptures interest of generation

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — The Lava Lite, that undulating curiosity many associate with the psychedelic '60s, is oozing back into popularity, the manufacturer says.

Actually, Lava Lites never went out of style among the middle Americans who buy most of them, according to Lava-Simplex Internationale, maker of the glowing lamp with the mysterious motion.

But sales have increased sharply in recent years, a boom that Lava-Simplex President John Mundy attributes to the same generation that has made The Monkees and paisley-print clothes vogue again.

"I have heard that the college kids are very interested in the product now," Mundy said at the company's Chicago headquarters. "I think there are a lot of kids who've never seen them. They're 18 and 19 and have never seen a Lava Lite."

For those who missed them the first time around, Lava Lites are electric lamps that somewhat resemble clear, 17-inch-tall beer bottles.

A 40-watt bulb in the metal base illuminates the vividly colored liquid inside and heats a shiny, eight-ounce blob of waxy material at the bottom. As the colored blob warms and melts, it rises and falls in slow motion through the liquid.

"Everybody puts it on top of the televison," Mundy said. "That's the classic place."

It was nearly impossible not to see a Lava Lite 20 years ago, when the novelty first fascinated the U.S. market.

"I remember it well," said the 40-year-old Mundy. "I was in college when the Lava Lite came out in 1965. A store down the street had two Lava Lites in the window going 24 hours a day. You couldn't walk down that street without stopping and staring at them."

He said he couldn't afford to spend $25 on what then struck him as a "frivolous" oddity, and never dreamed that one day he'd be making Lava Lites, which now sell for $45 to $55.

Mundy said he joined the company in 1978, two years after his father-in-law, Lawrence Haggerty, bought it from founders Adolph Wertheimer and Hyram Spector, who have since died.

Wertheimer and Spector began making Lava Lites in 1965 after acquiring the manufacturing rights from inventor Craven Walker of Bath, England, who called them Astro Lites, Mundy said.

Negotiator says arms talks 'productive'

By The Associated Press

GENEVA — The chief American negotiator said the round of nuclear arms talks that ends Wednesday has been the most productive so far, partly because of "phenomenal agreements" reached at the U.S.-Soviet summit in Iceland.

Max Kampelman said the basis for the Reykjavik agreements between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev was laid in previous sessions of the Geneva talks, which began March 12, 1985.

Kampelman said American and Soviet negotiators made progress at the sixth round in all three fields covered in Geneva: medium-range missiles; long-range, or strategic, nuclear weapons, and space and defense systems.

In an interview Tuesday with The Associated Press, the U.S. delegation chief said: "The agreements in Reykjavik as translated here have narrowed the gap between us. We still have a gap to narrow further, and we still have serious significant differences of opinion, and differences of interest.

"But when I look at the round and see all that has been accomplished here I have to say this is the most productive round we've had."

The United States feels an arms control agreement could be reached in the next year if each side makes a serious effort, he said. Both Washington and Moscow have brought new proposals to Geneva since the summit Oct. 11-12.

Agreement is nearest on medium-range missiles, Kampelman said, noting that Reagan and Gorbachev agreed to eliminate them in Europe and retain 100 warheads each on U.S. and Soviet territory.

"This means in effect a 100 percent reduction in Soviet SS-20s in Europe and an 80 percent reduction of Soviet SS-20s in Asia," he said, calling that a "very significant agreement."

One hindrance to an accord is the Soviet insistence that agreements be reached simultaneously in all three areas, Kampelman said.

He said they dropped that condition before Reykjavik, saying a separate intermediate-range agreement was possible, but Gorbachev introduced it again at the summit.

Washington has offered to abide by the treaty for five years, he said.

Agriculture program aids preparation for future profession

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

Students seeking more information about professions in agriculture may be able to use the Mentor program, part of the K-State chapter of the National Agri-Marketing Association.

The Mentor program is like a mini-internship, said Mark Goode, junior in agricultural economics and chairman of the K-State Mentor program.

The Missouri-Kansas professional NAMA chapter provides business professionals, or mentors, who are paired with K-State NAMA members (mentees) interested in the professional's field or area of agri-marketing.

Stan Erwine, K-State alumnus, serves as liaison between the MO-KAN NAMA chapter and the K-State chapter.

Mentors, Goode said, are used for counseling and educating the students about company products, services, responsibilities and philosophies, so they enter the work force better prepared.

He said the mentors are not intended to provide career placement for the mentees after graduation.

The mentor meets with the student at least once a month, with at least one meeting occuring at the mentors place of business.

The MO-KAN chapter also invites K-State members to its monthly meetings, where they can hear guest speakers and meet with professionals in their fields of interest.

"You get to show the professional people what you do know," Goode said.

Teres Lambert, instructor of journalism and mass communications, and K-State NAMA chapter adviser, said she believes the local chapter is fortunate to have the MO-KAN professional chapter close enough for students to associate with it.

"It's a chance for our people to meet a lot of professionals that in a couple of years they will be doing business with," Lambert said.

She said the MO-KAN meetings are a bonus because of the possible contacts which students can make.

A student is not required to attend the MO-KAN meetings to be involved in the program, Lambert said. Communication with the mentor can take place by telephone or through the mail.

Lambert said some people go into a job only to discover it does not suit their interests.

The Mentor program, she said, "gives you the big picture of a company or job situation."

The program, she said, allows a person to understand the correlation between a textbook and application in the real world.

Lambert said the program helps students who may be unable to obtain summer internships due to conflicting jobs or other responsibilities.

She said the program can benefit these students by allowing them a "mini-internship" while attending school, and by providing them with the outside experience they need.

Stacey Campbell, junior in agricultural journalism, joined the NAMA program this fall.

"Through NAMA we learn to market ourselves," Campbell said.

The program helps a person answer the question, "Is this something I want to do the rest of my life?", he said.

Although the Mentor program is about 2 years old, Lambert said it is getting a "new life."

She said the $10 membership fee is a small investment to make toward one's future.

Lambert said many associate the program strictly with agricultural students.

Anyone with a background or interest in agriculture can participate in the program, Lambert said, adding that students involved in any form of marketing communications can benefit from the program.

"You don't have to be a farm kid, and you don't have to wear cowboy boots in order to be in NAMA," she said. "You have to be a person who wants to strive to further himself in his field and be exposed to agriculture."

First four MX missiles operational at remote Wyoming launching site

By The Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Without fanfare and with its future still in doubt, the MX nuclear missile has been moved from the drawing board and testing pad to operational status in a remote missile field in Wyoming.

Officials with the Strategic Air Command here say the first four MX missiles have now been activated and stand poised for launch at F.E. Warren Air Force Base, surrounded by the older Minuteman missiles that currently form the heart of America's land-based intercontinental ballistic missile force.

As a result, the land-based leg of America's nuclear triad — for the first time ever — includes a missile that by itself can boost 10 warheads at once toward the Soviet Union. By comparison, the Minuteman carries no more than three warheads.

The Soviet Union, with more than 300 SS-18 missiles deployed, has long had a land-based missile capable of carrying 10 warheads.

The four MX missiles now on alert are among the first group of 10 scheduled for activation by late next month to meet what the Air Force calls "Initial Operational Capability" for the new weapon.

"We have four on alert now," Maj. Steve Garcia said during a recent briefing at SAC headquarters. "And we are on track to have all 10 on alert by Dec. 28."

That first batch of 10 MX missiles — which the Reagan administration has dubbed the Peacekeeper — will be followed by 40 more of the giant rockets, all of them to be installed in existing Minuteman silos at F.E. Warren by the end of 1988.

The activation of the first four follows what has proven to be an unusually successful development program, with all 14 of the MX missiles tested to date at Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif., having performed as expected.

But it also comes at a time of renewed political debate of the sort that has dogged the missile from its start in the early 1970s. The Reagan administration is preparing to mount a new campaign in Congress to acquire 100 MX missiles instead of the 50 authorized to date.

Congress has refused to authorize that second batch of 50 unless the Pentagon comes up with an acceptable — and affordable — plan for basing the missile in such a way as to improve its survivability.

Congressional critics maintain that by using existing Minuteman silos, the Defense Department places the MX at risk. They say that in these structures, the new missiles can be destroyed easily by a Soviet first strike.

The CAJUN CONNECTION

Spicy food has rich heritage

Like a giant hot-air vacuum poised over a steamy, stagnant pool, the sweltering, pale sun sucks the humidity out of the Louisiana bayou, dropping moisture on the sagging shoulders of those who venture outside. Hardly a whisper of wind disturbs the Spanish moss that drips from the trees.

In many homes of this region, the cooking is slow and the style is Cajun. The recipes are designed to be cooked slowly, so the heat is taken off a cook standing in a hot southern Louisiana kitchen.

In fact, when one reads a Cajun cookbook for the first time, one of the most striking things is the long cooking times for most of the recipes. Many books say to cook for times ranging from one to three hours.

This isn't fast food.

Cajun food is a true representation of the melting pot of American society. It combines styles of cooking made popular by the French, the Italians, the Spanish and the American Indians. It's a result of adaptations the Acadians had to make when they were forced into the swamps of Louisiana in the 1700s.

Cajun cooking requires skill — not the kind a chef might learn in a Paris cooking school, but skill that comes from dedication to a task. The chef maintains that dedication until he believes he has obtained perfection.

This dedication to perfection is exemplified in the preparation of roux (pronounced roo).

Sometimes called "Cajun napalm," roux is used to thicken soups, stews and gumbos. The skill comes with knowing how much flour to add after the oil has been heated and how long to cook it.

Add too much flour and it's ruined.

Allow it to cook too long after you add the flour and the black specks that appear let you know it's burned. When that happens, you throw it out and start over.

Spices and ingredients reflect all the influences that have shaped the cooking since the first Cajun settlers received assistance from their Indian neighbors more than two centuries ago.

There is a balance to achieve when trying to cook Cajun food, and that balance is to "stay just this side of the threshold between pleasure and pain," Paul Prudhomme said in a Newsweek article last year. Prudhomme is regarded by many as one of the chefs responsible for making Cajun cooking popular and sparking the recent interest in it around the nation.

"If you cross that threshold, people won't enjoy the food," he said. "If you stay this side of it, each bite leaves an aftertaste, and you want one more bite."

More people are trying Cajun food around the country because of people like Prudhomme and celebrities such as New York Yankee pitcher Ron Guidry, who provides a popular face for the cuisine.

Guidry called himself "the biggest Cajun there is" in the Newsweek article.

With restaurants specializing in Cajun cuisine opening in very non-Cajun cities like New York, Boston and Los Angeles, more people have the opportunity to be exposed to the food.

Locally, one restaurant has devoted part of its menu to Cajun food.

John Heritage, owner of the Hibachi Hut, 608 N. 12th St., said he has the dedication needed to cook authentic Cajun food.

"I'm so wrapped up in (Cajun cooking), it makes the effort worth it," Heritage said.

This dedication means paying attention to detail and working on a recipe until he knows it is ready to be served. "We're not afraid to throw (a bad batch of cooking) out," he said.

Food courtesy of Hibachi Hut

A spicy, cold Gulf shrimp gets doused with a little bit of lemon juice before being dipped in horseradish-cocktail sauce.

Heritage said the attention to the preparation of the food is important, though.

"Manhattan people have a very discerning palate," he said, "and if it isn't authentic, they won't eat it."

Even people who haven't tried the food can tell if it is authentic, Heritage said.

His Manhattan customers have shown just as much interest in the cooking as has been reported around the country, he said.

Heritage thought Manhattan was ready for Cajun-style cooking, so he started offering it one night a week at his restaurant. But the reception by the customers was so great that after three weeks the food was added to the menu full time.

Since Cajun food evolved out of the surroundings of the bayou country in Louisiana, some of the special food and spices are hard to find in Kansas. Heritage said he has to go out of state to find some of these specialty items, but he did find one supplier of a special sausage in Kansas.

Heritage declined to say where in the state has was able to find a hot, spicy Cajun sausage called andouille, but he said the other sausages and spices come from suppliers in Tennessee and other southern states.

Seafood and some other foods are flown in from New Orleans, Heritage said. For the seafood, it takes about 48 hours to get from the boat to Manhattan.

From time to time, Manhattan diners also can get a taste of alligator meat or crayfish (pronounced and spelled by Cajuns as "crawfish") in Heritage's restaurant. He said he hopes to offer fresh oysters from New Orleans in the future.

The most popular dishes enjoyed by customers have been gumbo and chicken etouffee, Heritage said. The gumbo is made with chicken, sausage and seafood, while chicken etouffee is chicken drenched in a thick sauce.

Expert help was used to fine-tune some of the recipes used in the restaurant, Heritage said. The expert is a Cajun chef, a friend of Heritage's, who he said has won the Louisiana Gumbo Festival for the last two years. Special attention was paid to the gumbo recipes and a recipe for red beans and rice.

Heritage said dedication to cooking is the key to Cajun cuisine, adding that if he didn't do it with dedication, then it wouldn't be worth doing.

Lack of dedication and tradition is something that worries chefs like Prudhomme, according to the Newsweek article.

Prudhomme personally tutored the chefs of a new Los Angeles Cajun restaurant, and he pulled up stakes for three months to move his entire operation from Louisiana to San Francisco to give diners on the West coast a taste of the real thing.

"My idea was that at least the food editors and eight or ten thousand of the most sophisticated diners would taste the real thing and have a standard to judge by," Prudhomme said.

"We were a great success," he said, "and then we left and 20 more bad restaurants opened."

Prudhomme said Cajun cooking "is a real tradition, but it's not simple and it takes discipline."

With these two thoughts in mind, Harold Alexander, whom the Newsweek writers called a self-taught gourmet, provided a method for weeding out inferior restaurants serving Cajun cooking.

"Just keep saying, 'etouffee, etouffee,'" he said. "If they don't know what you're talking about, they're not the real thing."

Chiefs' playoff hopes keep growing stronger

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Fifteen seasons have come and gone since Kansas City last reached the NFL playoffs. But the long drought may be coming to end.

Coach John Mackovic's troops were 3-3 six weeks into this season. Struggling with two rookie starters at linebacker and a simmering quarterback controversy, the Chiefs appeared headed for a 16th straight non-playoff year.

Nobody dreamed they would reel off four consecutive victories and creep to within one game of first place in the rugged AFC West.

But the Chiefs did. And now AFC West leader Denver, upset last week at home by San Diego, stands 8-2 and will host the Chiefs, 7-3, on Sunday in the biggest game a Kansas City team has played since 1971.

Tickets sales for the final two home games are brisk. Only to teams in the AFC, Denver and the New York Jets, have better records than the Chiefs. Football fever is taking root in a town that long ago learned to lean on baseball's Royals as a source of pride.

Yet the exhuberance of the fans has not yet matched the feeling of confidence sweeping through the players.

"I've been here a long time and I've seen us have a lot of losing seasons, a lot of frustrating seasons," nine-year veteran linebacker Gary Spani said. "I've never felt such a feeling of togetherness and pride on this team."

"We have almost two full months left, November and December, and we're going to keep on getting better," noseguard Bill Maas, the AFC defensive rookie of the year in 1984, said. "We feel that we're contenders and that we are going to keep on getting better."

Odds-makers have installed Kansas City as a nine-point underdog this week. Denver's Mile High Stadium traditionally has not been a happy place for the Chiefs, who have not won there since 1982.

"I guess you'd have to say we're the underdogs, because we'll be playing at their place, and because their record is better than ours," cornerback Albert Lewis, a stalwart in a secondary that leads the AFC with 19 interceptions, said.

"But we aren't thinking of ourselves as underdogs," Lewis said. "There is a feeling on this team now that we're playing as a team, not as individuals, not as a defensive unit and not as an offensive unit. That's why we were able to overcome the adversity early against Seattle."

The Chiefs' fourth straight victory began on a worrisome note last Sunday. Quarterback Bill Kenney, who replaced the struggling Todd Blackledge four games ago, threw two interceptions on his first four passes. Then Emile Harry fumbled the ball on Seattle's first punt.

But the Seahawks, who beat the Chiefs in September, did not get one point out of the three first-quarter turnovers, and then the Chiefs' offense came to life.

With Kenney hitting nine consecutive passes, the Chiefs built a 17-0 halftime lead en route to a 27-7 victory.

"This wasn't just another game," Maas said. "We had more to play for. We were not only playing Seattle, but all the other wild card teams as well."

"We've been in situations like that before when we didn't recover," veteran safety Deron Cherry said. "It was like last week in San Diego when the whole team played terrible and we were behind 16-0. But we came back to win that game.

"And we had a feeling on the sideline today (against Seattle) that we would be OK if we just held together and didn't let them take advantage of the turnovers. We're playing together, as a team, and we didn't used to do that."

"Any team that has success in the NFL has that kind of attitude, that kind of collective spirit," Mackovic said. "And Denver has evidenced it more than most teams. They really do understand it."

Mackovic is trying to take a low-key approach to the Denver game.

"I'm just looking at it as time to go play. I'm not going to approach this game in any regard for a concern for anything we do," he said. "I'm concerned that Denver has a great defense, and that (John) Elway is a great quarterback. But we've learned already how to react in games like this."

His players may know how to handle important games. But Chiefs' fans may not. Fifteen years is a long time to be out of contention.

K-State fencing club offers novices chance

By LYNETTE HAMILTON
Collegian Reporter

It's a subtle sport that requires wind, stamina and quickness. Hanley Jackson, professor of music, says it compares to "chess with muscles."

The sport he refers to is fencing.

Jackson, adviser for K-State's fencing club, said the club started seven years ago and includes both men and women interested in fencing. Members meet at Douglass Recreation Center and practice the sport they love. A fencing class is taught by Manhattan resident Doug Varney through University for Man. Few members in the club have any fencing experience at all, Varney said.

Although Jackson fenced when he was young, he said the sport is strenuous and participants must be in good physical condition.

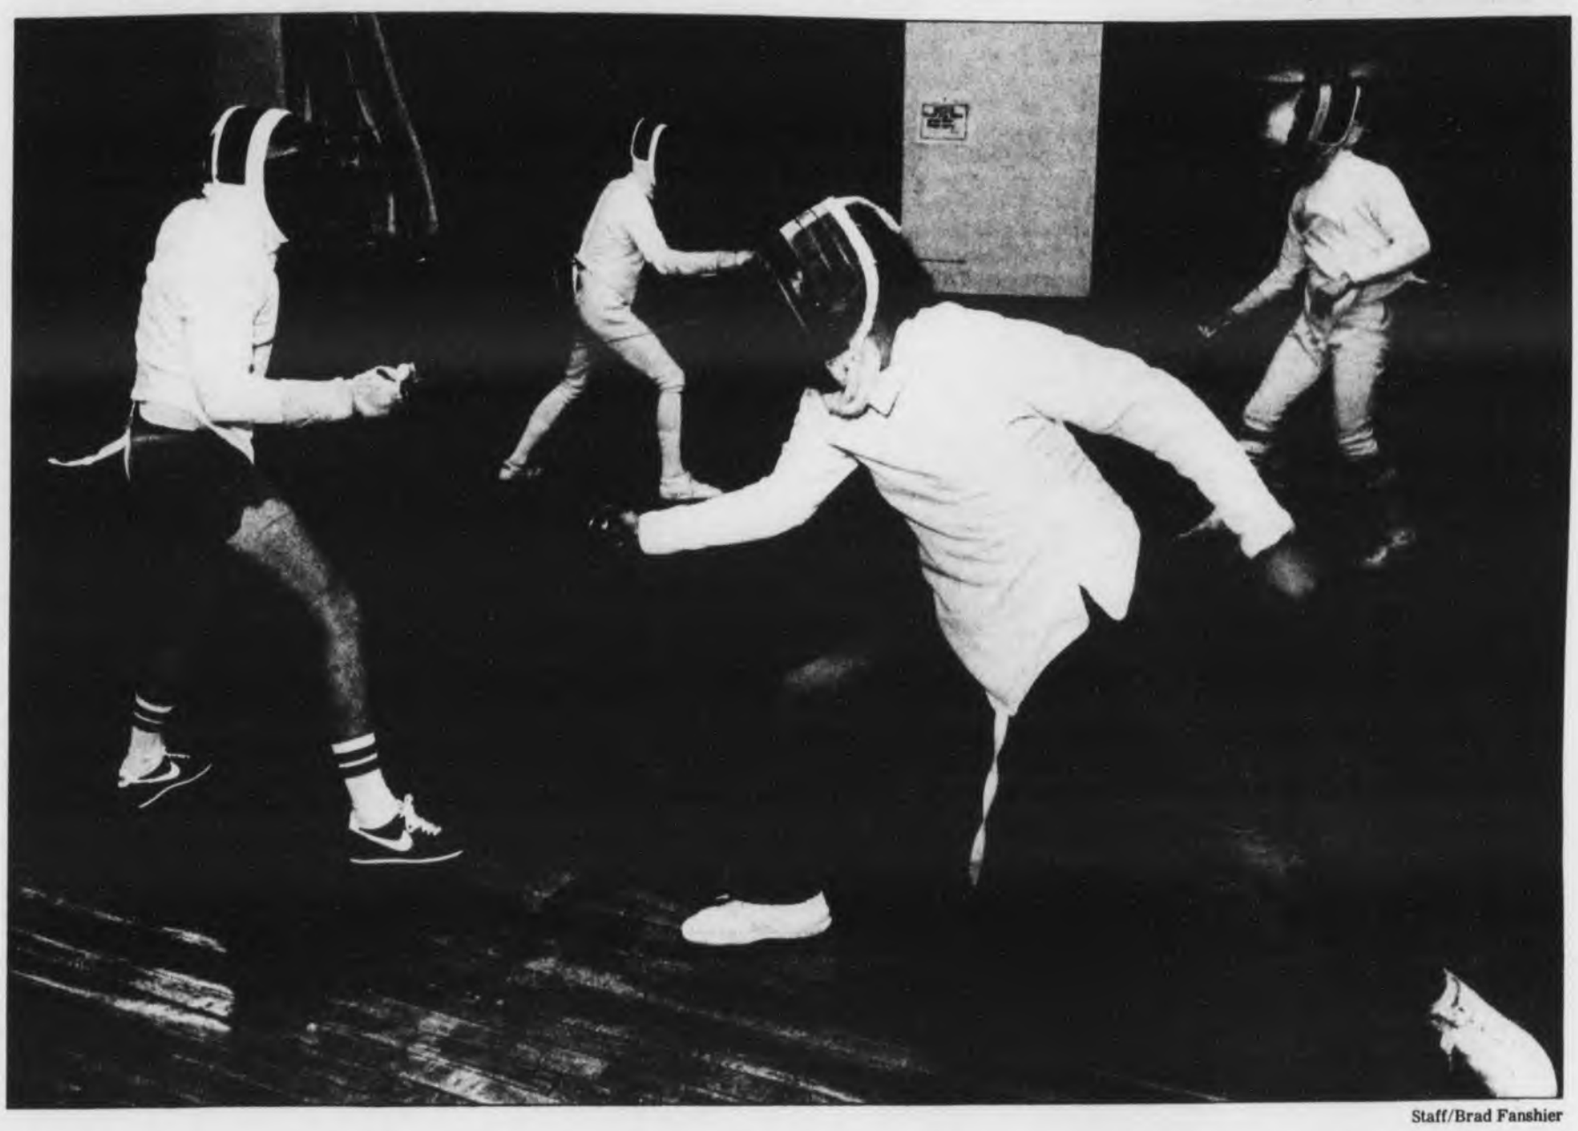
"It uses a lot of leg muscles, wind, stamina and quickness but the moves and techniques can be easily learned in three months," Varney said.

At the beginning level, fencers mainly work on drills and mechanics of watching the target area, said Randy Hanes, junior in mechanical engineering and president of K-State's Fencing Club.

At the competitive level, members can participate in electronically controlled meets.

In a meet, each fencer wears a metallic jacket made of regular cloth and wire mesh flex. When the opponent's weapon comes in contact with the jacket, a light comes on which indicates if a touch — when the opponent's weapon comes in contact with the target area — was made. With each touch, a point is earned and action is stopped.

There are three types of weapons used in fencing: foil, epee and sabre.



Foiling is the most common for beginners. It represents how men were trained for combat in the 15th and 16th centuries. The target area represents the area covered when wearing a waist-length tank top, Hanes said. And epee is similar to foiling.

But in sabre the target area is anywhere above the hips and simulates combat from horseback. A sword-like weapon is used and the opponent can make a touch by putting any part of the blade in the target area.

"It's much more dynamic than the other two," Hanes said.

Fencing club members own beginning equipment which consists of a foil, sabre, pads, jacket and face mask. The serious fencer could spend from $200 to $300 on equipment and gear that fits correctly, Hanes said.

"One of my goals is to make fencing more widespread," Hanes said. "I'd like to see the United States compete at the world level better because Europe has always been the best."

Scott Burkholder, graduate research assistant in mechanical engineering, and Winston Yang, professor of statistics, work on basic fencing moves while Nial Burnham, Manhattan, and Randy Hanes, junior in mechanical engineering, practice more advanced moves at the Douglas Recreation Center.

KU freshman discovers self filling in as shooting guard

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Kevin Pritchard, a freshman guard with a long-range shooting touch, will be in Coach Larry Brown's starting lineup when Kansas meets the Russian national team Nov. 19, and in the official season opener against Tennessee-Martin 10 days later.

"Pritchard is going to have to play this season, because we need outside shooting, and he's the best shooter we recruited," said Brown.

"Life is full of challenges, and this is one of them," Pritchard said of his role, stepping in to start for a team that was among the Final Four in the NCAA basketball tournament last season.

Brown has high praise for his star recruit, who averaged 22.3 points last season for Edison High School in Tulsa, Okla.

"I giggle every time I think about him," the Kansas coach said. "He's going to be great.

"The thing that impresses me is he can do other things beside shoot," Brown said. "His high school coach played him at big guard, and he shot it, and he didn't handle the ball. But we recruited him to take the place of Cedric Hunter and Mark Turgeon someday, and he has it in the back of his mind, he will play point guard someday."

Turgeon, a senior, puts Pritchard in the same shooting category as the departed Ron Kellogg and Calvin Thompson.

"He is the same type of shooter," he said. "He comes out every day, and he hits his first shot, and you never see him miss more than two or three in a row...He will be something before he leaves here."

Pritchard was named most valuable player in the Derby Classic high school all-star game in Louisville last April, and he says he built his confidence at the U.S. Olympic Festival in August.

Pritchard said he chose Kansas over Kentucky and Tulsa because he liked the combination of academics, the players and Brown's coaching.

Wildcats' post-season dreams relying on defeat of Missouri

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

K-State's women's volleyball team will close out the regular season and a current four-match road trip tonight, when they travel to Columbia, Mo., for a Big Eight match with Missouri.

The 'Cats, 12-15 overall and 2-7 in conference action, are coming off a four-game loss to OU on Friday and a defeat at the hands of Oral Roberts in four games Saturday in Tulsa.

K-State needs a victory to have a chance for fifth-place conference finish, which will also depend on the outcome of the Missouri-OU match, Coach Scott Nelson said.

"This is our final regular-season match, while Missouri has two more matches, us and OU. K-State and Missouri both have two victories, so the best we can finish is either fifth or sixth," he said.

Missouri, 8-17 and 2-5, is coming off a four-game loss to Southern Illinois-Carbondale, but had won its two previous matches over Bradley and St. Louis University.

In the first Wildcats-Tigers Big Eight meeting, Deanna Miller had 29 kills and Margaret Yanics added 17 to lead Missouri to a 12-15, 15-10, 15-10, 10-15, 15-7 victory at Ahearn Field House. Both teams also met in the Pepsi/KSU Invitational in September, with the 'Cats taking the four-game victory.

At this point of the season, Nelson will be looking for the leadership from two seniors, Helen Bundy and Cindy Durham.

"Helen has been with us four years, experiencing the peaks and valleys of our program. She has re-established herself as a blocking champion, which also reflects on our team," Nelson said.

"Cindy, one of our outside hitters, is a new addition to our team this year. She is improving on her serves every week and will be counted on for her leadership qualities," he said.

Nelson said the Wildcats are working on the areas the team can control toward the end of a season.

"Right now we are in a transition period of trying to refocus our game to the Big Eight championship. We are going to put out a good effort and minimize our unforced errors and our giving up quick points in our upcoming matches," Nelson said.

This is the end of the of K-State's regular season, but just the beginning for the preparation of the Big Eight championships, Nelson said.

Driesell's demise as college coach result of poor off-court leadership

TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

There is no doubt in my mind that Lefty Driesell is a great basketball tactician. Unfortunately for Driesell, there is much more to being a college basketball coach than simply deciding what offense and defense your players should run.

The biggest part in being a college coach is being able to deal with young people — not just convincing them to come play for your program, but teaching them how to handle life.

When Driesell resigned last week as Maryland's basketball coach, it was his inability to be a complete college coach which did him in.

Drugs have inundated American society. From the top of America's income scale, all the way to the bottom, drugs are an American passion.

This is a fact which must have escaped Driesell. When dealing with any form of college-age American, one must be prepared to face the harsh reality of drug use and abuse. As Athletic Director Larry Travis said, "They're here; they're everywhere."

Driesell is still trying to hide from the fact that he did not pay enough attention to his players' personal lives to be a complete college coach.

With his resignation from his job as Maryland basketball coach, one hopes Driesell would realize that it was not his on-court coaching abilities which brought the doubters from near and far down upon him, but it was his inability in dealing with the lives of his players which were his demise.

Drug use in America is an epidemic. Sadly enough, often American society attempts to blame the visible use of drugs by popular athletes and other entertainers as the root of the problem.

The problem, however, lies much deeper than this. The problem lies in our own freedom.

Americans thrive on their freedom of choice and — legal or illegal — the simple presence of drugs offers all of us the choice to use or not to use.

Teen-agers would be snorting and smoking even if athletes were not. Athletes and entertainers are not the leaders of society; they are simply part of it.

Thus, the importance of educating collegiate athletes about drug use and abuse does not lie in their influence upon America's youth, but the effects of drugs upon the players themselves.

Boston Celtic first-round draft choice and former Maryland basketball star Len Bias' death from cocaine use stands as fair warning to America's youth, but the engrained attitude of them having the freedom of choice still remains.

Now Driesell is involved in an effort to bring a National Basketball Association team to Charlotte, N.C. Being a professional coach is the ideal move for a man who cannot handle the complete responsibilities at the college level.

Now Driesell can be the masterful basketball tactician he has previously proven himself to be, and he can let management worry about dealing with the players.

Smith files for free agency

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Outfielder Lonnie Smith, who with bonuses got $900,000 from the Kansas City Royals last season, is welcome to return in 1987 if he's willing to take a pay cut.

While Smith declared for free agency Monday, he hinted a willingness to make a deal that would keep him in a Royals uniform, even if not at the $950,000 salary called for under the option year of his three-year contract.

That contract was signed in January of 1985 while Smith was with the St. Louis Cardinals, and the Royals won't take up the option. General Manager John Schuerholz said that the team will pay Smith $200,000 for the buy-out clause in his contract and try to negotiate a one-year deal with him.

"We would not extend his contract, so his free agency was expected," Schuerholz said. "We'd like to have him back, but it's too early in the negotiations to know if we will."

"I'm sure there's a figure we can both be happy with," Smith said in a telephone interview.

He is the fifth Royal to file for free agency. Others are outfielder Rudy Law, utility man Jamie Quirk, outfielder Lynn Jones and shortstop Onix Concepcion. Schuerholz said only Law and Quirk will be offered contracts.

Rugby 'B' team falls short

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's "B-team" rugby sqaud missed two conversion kicks which enabled Missouri Western to hold on for a 16-14 win Saturday at St. Joseph.

Missouri Western and K-State had to battle sloppy field conditions, but Missouri Western managed to conquer the field for a 3-0 halftime lead on a penalty kick.

The host team never trailed and built a 12-0 lead before the Wildcats managed to climb back into the game with a pair of tries from Issac Madison.

K-State is scheduled to play the Univeristy of Kansas Saturday at Lawrence.

Archeology class participants explore Hopewell Indian site

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

While thousands of K-State fans fill the stadium on Saturday to watch the football team, 12 students are in another field about 10 miles south of town digging holes.

These are not ordinary holes. They are exactly 2 meters by 2 meters dug at a precise location according to a grid.

Instead of a coach, these students are directed by Patricia O'Brien, professor of anthropology. Instead of a game, the students are participating in an Archeology Field Methods class currently excavating a Hopewell Indian site dated at A.D. 300.

'It's like opening a treasure chest, if you're finding something.'
—Ruth Brockway

Hopewell is a generic term for an ancient Indian culture found throughout the Midwest. The culture, which has no written history, got its name when artifacts were first discovered on a man's land whose last name was Hopewell, O'Brien said.

In the last 15 years, about 150 students have taken the class, O'Brien said, and the vast majority are not anthropology majors. Non-anthropology students take the course for various reasons.

Anne Platoff, a recent history and political science graduate from K-State, is taking the class because she plans on getting a master's in museum science.

Tim Knapp, junior in anthropology, is in the class because he wants to become a professional archeologist and the more fieldwork experience he has, the better his chances are for getting into graduate school.

"I really like being outside," said Chris Albright, senior in history and political science. "It (digging eight hours every Saturday) isn't that hard of work. I just thought I'd check it out."

"Archeology is a different form of history. History is the written record. For archeology, it's just one of our sources," Albright said.

"I'm a glutton for punishment," said Ruth Brockway, senior in archeology. "I like it. It's the sixth dig I've participated in — the second at K-State. It's like opening a treasure chest, if you're finding something. If you're not, it's very boring and tedious. Sometimes you get discouraged and wonder why you're out here, until you find something."

The students combat the drudgery of digging by listening to tunes on a radio, by discussing movies, television shows, campus issues and religion and by telling jokes.

The students learned early in the dig that Indiana Jones is not the typical archeologist.

"There's this incredible misconception that we dig up treasures. There's only one King Tut's tomb, but the media emphasizes the spectacular," O'Brien said.

The students learn how an archeologist digs a site, how to clean and process the collection and how to interpret the data they find. By learning the process, the students can better understand the importance of archeologists' work in reference to modern life, O'Brien said.

"It's a good class to take because it's interesting and you actually get to see how archeological information is collected," said Donna Geer, junior in anthropology and Spanish.

"The class is a chance for me to get more experience in the field and in the lab. In most fieldwork, you never see an artifact once it leaves the ground. In the field school, you can follow an artifact, catalog and analyze it and see how it fits into the site as a whole," said Tim Gillen, auditor of the class.

The best way to find a site is to walk across a newly plowed field and look for artifacts made of flint, such as arrowheads, sidescrapers and endscrapers. If some artifacts are found, the next step is to dig an exploratory trench.

O'Brien began digging in Ashland Bottoms in 1978, when she and her students dug an exploratory trench to see what they would find. The site produced several artifacts so they dug again from 1980 to 1983. In 1984, the class dug the Fort Riley privy at Fort Riley's request. The class returned to the Ashland Bottoms site in 1986.

"People have been finding arrowheads here for a long time," O'Brien said.

"There's this pervasive idea that we're treasure hunting or we're disturbing the dead. The reality is neither of these things — we're reconstructing the past," O'Brien said.

'We're digging garbage. We're trying to recreate the mundane.'
—Patricia O'Brien

The purpose of the class is to discover what the local Hopewell were doing in the area and how they were linked in the larger network of Hopewellian culture. The class finds this out through what they left behind, O'Brien said.

"We're digging garbage," O'Brien said. "We're trying to recreate the mundane."

To date, several storage pits, a fireplace, some arrowheads and other artifacts have been found at the site. Flint chips, animal bone and seeds are also used to reconstruct the culture.

"The find of the dig is a small piece of obsidian," O'Brien said. Obsidian is not native to the area, so it ties the local Hopewell to those farther east through trade. Obsidian can be obtained in Yellowstone National Park and the largest amount of obsidian is found in the Hopewell sites in Ohio.

The Hopewell are thought to have combined agriculture with hunting and gathering for their subsistence. Charred seeds found at the site prove the Hopewell farmed some corn, but mostly a plant called marsh elder. Marsh elder was domesticated like wheat and used for similar purposes.

Sites farther east suggest the Hopewell were concerned with religion and death. Several burial sites lie in Ashland Bottoms. One burial mound is about 35 feet in diameter and about 5 feet high.

Most of the burial mounds have been dug up throughout the years, O'Brien said.

O'Brien said Americans are similar to the Hopewell in the way the population was dispersed across the Midwest — most of the population was concentrated in Illinois and the other eastern states and thinned out farther west in Missouri and Kansas.

O'Brien said the Hopewell and Americans reached Kansas when population growth pushed them west and because Kansas was a beautiful area.

Stars indicate areas where remains of Hopewellian Indian settlements have been discovered.

Women farmers meet to discuss problems of agriculture industry

By The Associated Press

LUBBOCK, Texas — Female farmers from throughout the United States gathered in this west Texas city to hash over problems facing an agriculture industry that a former Agriculture Department official says is heading into a wild year.

The 10th annual convention of Women Involved in Farm Economics, which continued through Monday and is the largest in the association's history, national WIFE president Naiomi Benson of Colorado said.

Bob Bergland, who led the U.S. Department of Agriculture under the Carter administration and now is general manager of the National Rural Electric Co-op Association, told 200 WIFE members Saturday that absolute solutions to rural problems may not exist.

But he said lawmakers are working on them.

"Next year will be a wild one," Bergland said of farming's economic situation. "There definitely will be a down-sliding in American agriculture. The question is, how will we solve it?"

Bergland predicted that because Democrats gained control of the U.S. Senate in Tuesday's elections, there will be public hearings on the state of agriculture in the United States.

But he noted that one issue surely to be targeted in such hearings will be the enormous amounts of money being spent on the 1985 farm bill.

"Congress considers the farm bill a failure, and I don't know if they can change anything because they may not be able to override a veto," he noted. "It could be two years of a stalemate between Congress and the president.

"The deficits, the federal budget now will be the biggest item," he said. "It will be a political fight, a knock-down, drag-out battle royal."

WIFE was born in 1976 out of the economic hardships that have plagued the nation's Farm Belt for more than a decade.

Bergland recalled the almost constant presence of WIFE members, who in their official capacity often wear red clothes, in Washington while he was agriculture secretary.

But he noted that WIFE faces even greater demands in the future because foreign nations once dependent on the United States for their food are becoming increasingly self-sufficient.

"So we have to figure out how we'll live in a world that we can't control," said Bergland. "The market-oriented export policy sounds real American, but it means that the American farmer will be competing with the peasant classes around the world."

Bergland said U.S. agriculture must curb supplies either by increased voluntary diversion of the land or by mandatory controls.

Kurosawa's 'Ran' spectacular film, but not as strong as earlier efforts

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Director Akira Kurosawa's latest film, "Ran," is as spectacular as movies get anymore. From beginning to end, the film is filled with impressive sets and hundreds upon hundreds of extras. It isn't necessarily Kurosawa at his best, but even lesser Kurosawa is better than 99 percent of the movies today.

Film Review

Compared with his earlier films, "Ran" is much colder and more severe, but that seems to go along with Kurosawa's change in attitude. Nowadays he's much more preoccupied with images of despair and anguish. I prefer the days when his movies were more optimistic, but his more recent work is just as powerful as ever.

Like most Kurosawa films, "Ran" takes place in the past, when Japanese men cover themselves in armor and fight in battle after battle. This time the story is about a lord who has spent the past 50 years keeping peace among the rival clans of his domain. But now, he has decided to hand down his power to his eldest son.

Only one of Lord Hidetora's sons, Saburo (the youngest), dares tell him that this plan is hopeless. Hidetora taught his sons all about power and cruelty, so how can he expect them to live peacefully together when only one is in control? Of course, Saburo is right. As soon as Hidetora steps down and the eldest son gains control, the betrayals begin. And soon the betrayals escalate into full-scale war.

If this sounds vaguely familiar, it should; it's essentially Shakespeare's "King Lear." Instead of having three daughters who will betray him, Hidetora has sons. And Saburo takes the Cordelia role.

The movie might have benefitted from a few more doses of "King Lear" because Hidetora becomes little more than a symbolic figure. Instead of giving the character a psychological interior, Kurosawa goes for spectacle.

Yes, there is plenty of spectacle, but Hidetora never quite seems capable of the ferocious past he supposedly had. This is partly a weakness in the performance of Tatsuya Nakadai and partly a weakness in the script. Too much time is devoted to exposition in the film's first half hour, and not enough time is spent on developing the characters.

But whatever the weaknesses of the film, Kurosawa is still the master of action. The battle sequences are particularly impressive. In one battle sequence, the soundtrack goes silent and music takes over. The music isn't loud and violent, but rather gentle. As arrows fall in a hail and soldiers scream out in agony, the only sound we hear is the soft music.

At times, though, the movie becomes too premeditated. Every shot is so well-planned that the movie lacks spontaneity. In these instances it becomes clear there is an artist behind the camera guiding our perceptions. But even if the movie is premeditated, it is powerful and exhilarating nonetheless.

Science society offers research possibilities

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

Scientific research in fields ranging from acid precipitation to ultrasonic catalysis is being promoted in junior and senior high schools across the state.

The Kansas Junior Academy of Science, located in Bluemont Hall, was organized to provide opportunities for students interested in sciences and mathematics who wish to enhance their ability and accomplishments in these fields, said Gail Schroyer, administrative assistant for KJAS.

Although K-State houses the program, which is hosted by the Senior Academy of Science, the senior academy is made up of scientists from most Kansas colleges and universities.

Junior or senior high school students interested in any area of science or mathematics who have the desire to investigate a problem are eligible for membership.

KJAS gives students an opportunity to conduct scientific or mathematic research during the school year and report their results at district and state meetings.

The academy's meetings are purposely not set up like high school science fairs targeted for the advanced and gifted student.

"The overtone of competition is made less evident, because there are no winners or losers," Shroyer said.

Two ratings are awarded at the meetings — "excellent" and "outstanding," the higher of the two, she said.

Students are encouraged to work on their projects during the year and present their findings at district meetings in early April.

Students receiving the "outstanding" ratings at the district meetings are invited to the state meeting in late April at Kansas Newman College, she said.

The purposes of KJAS outlined in the KJAS handbook are to "stimulate interest in science investigations amoung young people, to encourage students to conduct scientific investigations, to offer training in presenting scientific matters before the public, to afford opportunity for making contacts with scientists, and to provide opportunities to share scientific interests with others."

Students can do research in any area of study in which they are interested as long as research is conducted using scientific methods, Shroyer said.

A project consists of the total work done in investigating a problem — everything from the initial thinking and planning through all of the steps that lead to the final product of the endeavor, according to the handbook.

Most students' science projects address a problem of personal interest. The problem a student chooses to work on may come from a question that arose from material he or she studied or discussed in a science course, or it may be related to some interest he or she has out of class, Shroyer said.

Those students going on to the state level are all recognized in some fashion. She said students with entries judged "outstanding" are offered an expense-paid trip.

Student recruitment effort attracts 30

Visitors shown diverse campus view

By JIM BLAKE
Collegian Reporter

As part of the program of recruitment for K-State, the Office of Admissions hosted Senior Day on Tuesday for about 30 students and their parents.

The students, from seven north-central high schools, were welcomed by Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement.

"I welcome as many high school groups to campus as I possibly can," Bosco said. "I emphasize the strength and high quality of campus life."

In his welcoming address, Bosco described the positive feeling on campus provided by both students and faculty, pointing out that K-State provides the opportunity to attend a major university and still have the friendly atmosphere of a smaller college.

He said support from a student's parents is important towards the success of a student.

He also said there is nothing wrong with being undecided on a career when entering college.

"I counsel (students) that it is not important that they already have a major determined when they enter college," Bosco said. "One out of five students here at K-State finish in their original choice of curriculum. Sixty percent of the students change their major at least three times before they graduate."

Steve Johnson, student body president and junior in agricultural economics, also spoke to the high school seniors about the importance of being involved in campus activities.

"The activities board has a list of over 300 activities students can be involved in," Johnson said. He stressed involvement in more than just studies; he also recommended clubs outside of classwork.

Amy Thompson, of Mankato, and her parents attended the Senior Day and said they were impressed by K-State.

"I really like K-State," said Julie Schuler, counselor in preadmissions. "I have a $300 scholarship from Fort Hays (State University) but K-State has a better school. The business field is a lot better here than at Hays."

Thompson said she also intended to try out for the band when she attends K-State.

"It impressed me a lot on Band Day," she said.

Schuler said she thought the day had been successful in spite of the small group attending due to high school football playoffs.

"At least all nine (of the schools invited) had the opportunity to visit," Schuler said. "Perhaps if it wasn't during high school playoffs, we would have had a bigger turnout."

She said if there was anything they might consider doing different with the program, it would be providing sleeping accomodations for visiting seniors and their parents traveling long distances.

During one of the department tours, Schuler said some of the parents expressed concerns that the students may become too involved in outside activities to maintain their studies. But, the parents were impressed with the interaction of students and advisers, she said.

"They thought it was great individual treatment with advisers," she said.

Poll reveals opinions on school reform

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Teachers endorse many goals of school reform, but most don't think it has improved their lot and a growing number have seriously considered quitting, according to a poll released Tuesday.

The Louis Harris poll, commissioned by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., was the third annual canvassing of public school teachers' views on issues affecting them.

The 1986 poll included for the first time the opinions of principals, superintendents, teacher union leaders, state education officials, state legislators who serve on education committees and deans of colleges of education.

Fifty-five percent of classroom teachers said they have seriously considered leaving the profession, up from 51 percent in the 1985 survey.

Over 90 percent of teachers and education leaders agree that poor pay is a leading contributor to an impending teacher shortage.

"This survey reinforces the value of teachers in our society and the need to pay them more," said Mary Hatwood Futrell, president of the 1.8 million-member National Education Association, the nation's largest teacher union.

The consensus apparently breaks down when it comes to education reform.

Only 36 percent of teachers felt recent reforms have had a positive impact on teachers. But 78 percent of state education officials and 73 percent of legislators thought reform had helped teachers.

Teachers and most educational leaders also remain at loggerheads over merit pay.

Of the 72 percent of teachers who said they were familiar with it, 71 percent were opposed to such systems. Fifty-five percent of principals and 97 percent of union leaders agreed with the teachers. But 73 percent of education college deans favor merit pay, as did slim majorities of superintendents, state legislators and state education officials.

Teachers were split in their views of career ladder programs, such as the one in Tennessee which divides teaching into different jobs and then gives teachers the chance to move up a ladder of higher salaries and greater responsibility. Of the 39 percent of teachers who said they were familiar with career ladders, 49 percent were in favor, 46 percent opposed.

Mentor teacher programs, in which excellent teachers are assigned to coach other teachers, proved most popular among those surveyed. Of the 44 percent of teachers familiar with such programs, 82 percent favored them, as did over 80 percent of all categories of educational leaders.

A narrow majority of teachers — 52 percent — supported the idea of a national teacher certification board along the lines proposed last spring by a Carnegie task force. Seventy percent of union leaders and 61 percent of education college deans were also supportive of a board.

State education officials, who have sole power to certify new teachers, were more lukewarm to the national board, with 46 percent in favor, 47 percent opposed and the rest unsure.

The margin of error was plus or minus 5 percentage points.

Catholic bishops spurn conservatives in electing moderates

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — America's Roman Catholic bishops, beating back a challenge by conservative prelates, elected two Midwestern moderates Tuesday to lead their national organization for the next three years.

The group's new president, Archbishop John L. May of St. Louis, spoke almost immediately of "a great need for healing" among Catholics who are chafing under church rules that some see as too rigid in the 20th century.

However, May's comments made it clear that he and others in the National Conference of Catholic Bishops weren't about to push for any revolt against Vatican authority.

"We are members of the universal Catholic Church," he said at a brief news conference. "We are pledged as bishops to work in unity with the visible symbol of unity who is the Holy Father, the pope.

"And we will do it, our healing, in that way. There's no other way we can," he said.

Still, election of May and of Cincinnati Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk as vice president suggested a continuation of the activist bent of the bishops conference — a stance that has been unpopular with some high Vatican officials who see all church authority as emanating from Rome.

Conservative bishops made a strong push for Boston Cardinal Bernard Law. However, a majority of the bishops, many of whom are upset over this year's Vatican disciplining of liberal Seattle Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen, defeated Law, who has been outspoken in defense of the Vatican's action in that and other cases.

Many of the nearly 300 bishops attending the conference met behind closed doors all Tuesday afternoon, thrashing out the Hunthausen case and trying to decide what, if any, public response to make.

Hunthausen was ordered by the Vatican to turn over much of his authority to a Vatican-appointed auxiliary bishop after being judged too liberal in such matters as ministry to homosexuals and divorced Catholics and the dispensing of absolution for sins to large groups.

The bishops were expected to make at least a bare-bones statement late in the day about what they had or hadn't been able to decide in the private meeting. Instead, after nearly four hours, they began trickling out side doors of the hotel meeting room, making no comment when approached except that the closed session would resume in the morning.

A spokesman for Hunthausen said the archbishop, too, would have no comment until the session was finished.

May, 64, a native of Evanston, Ill., was a parish priest in Chicago from 1947 to 1956, then worked at other posts in that city before becoming an auxiliary bishop in Chicago in 1967, bishop of Mobile, Ala., in 1969 and then archbishop in St. Louis in 1980.

During his six years in St, Louis, including three as vice president of the national bishops' group, he has made a number of statements that might be considered at least relatively liberal, particularly on the subject of the church's failure to live up to its stated goal of equality for women.

"Jesus was clearly a radical feminist of his time," he said once. "By and large, the church did not remain faithful, we must admit, to the radical feminism of Jesus."

Still, he complained on Tuesday of women's-ordination demonstrators protesting his services ordaining men as priests. And he has given no indication he would try to buck the pope's firm opposition to female priests.

Pilarczyk, 52, was born in Dayton, Ohio, was ordained a priest in 1959 and became an auxiliary bishop in Cincinnati in 1974, working under now-Cardinal Joseph Bernardin.

FAA explores loss of plane radar systems

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Radar controlling high altitude air traffic from the Texas Panhandle to Southern California was knocked out by a power failure for 40 minutes last week, and another radar was down for more than two days.

Federal Aviation Administration officials said Tuesday that planes were safely shifted to other areas. No accidents were reported and safety was not jeopardized, but the incident is under investigation, FAA officials said.

The power failure at the air traffic control center at Albuquerque, N.M., which handles through traffic in the Southwest, and at a radar station in Arizona both occurred last Thursday, the FAA in Washington confirmed Tuesday.

The outages were first reported Tuesday by the Orange County Register in California.

Fee

"The point is we won't be the ones tacking it on," Folk said. "If it gets tacked on, it's going to be (the students) doing."

Folk said he thought the athletic department should provide Student Senate with a budget each year if an athletic fee is assessed to show where the money is being spent.

Kirk Caraway, task force member and senior in political science and philosophy, said the task force could stipulate that the athletic department match the amount of money generated by the student athletic fee each year to give to non-revenue sports.

Currently, the 1986-87 budget for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics stands at $5.1 million, with $2.6 million budgeted for revenue sports, $827,150 for non-revenue sports and $1.7 million for administration, according to records supplied by Mike Jones, business manager for the department.

Majerus said he was concerned with the budgets.

"We haven't even determined if there's a need for the money yet," he said. "We haven't determined where the problem was in the department — was it an artificial or permanent deficit?"

Folk said he wasn't as concerned with the athletic department's budget deficit as he was with funding the non-revenue scholarships.

"I don't think we're trying to make up for the athletic department's deficit," he said.

"I think that's the way (Athletic Director Larry) Travis is looking at it," Majerus said. "This is a permanent base of revenue coming in — he can bank on it."

Kelly Lamborn, senior in journalism and mass communications, said she saw "a problem with taxing 16,000 students for scholarships for 89 students."

"As a person that's never going to get an athletic scholarship, I personally have a little bit of a problem with that," she said.

Majerus said he believed the original issue was that the athletic department needed money because it had a deficit, not because it wanted money to support non-revenue scholarships.

Hostages

Speaking for Sontag, Coudari said one of the prisoners was an Irishman. Brian Keenan, an Irish teacher, was kidnapped in west Beirut April 11 and has not been heard from since. He is is the only Irishman among 17 foreigners still missing in Lebanon.

No group has claimed Keenan's kidnapping or made any demands for his release.

The identities and nationalities of the other four men were not known. Coudari said Sontag saw them but was not allowed to talk to them.

Sontag conveyed, however, that one prisoner slipped him a scrap of paper Monday on which was written: "I am Irish. Please tell my family."

According to Coudari, Sontag did not know whether Americans were among the other prisoners. Six Americans are among the missing.

The group that held Coudari and Sontag, the Revolutionary Justice Organization, also claimed it kidnapped Americans Frank Reed and Edward Tracy.

Coudari said he had lived for 12 years in Lebanon and 13 in Syria. He was kidnapped in west Beirut in February, but Revolutionary Justice first said it held him on Sept. 24. Coudari did not explain the time lag.

Sontag, a Beirut resident for more than 40 years, was abducted May 7.

As photographers and television crews rushed into the room in Damascus for the handover ceremony, Coudari told reporters: "This is too much honor. I could well have done without this show."

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa declared amid the clamor: "The Syrian government has helped in obtaining the release of the French hostages. We've done everything we could to get the release of (all) hostages and will continue to do so."

Syria has helped free five Frenchmen this year. One American, the Rev. Lawrence Jenco, reached freedom through Damascus in July.

beneficial as possible according to committee standards.

The committee requires the site to be readily accessible to all campus visitors and the campus community, provide ample parking, be closely associated with other fine arts and performing arts activities and be a symbolic expression of the values supported by the University mission, Traeger said.

The structure would include a permanent collections gallery, a changing exhibit gallery, an auditorium, a lecture hall to seat 200 and two meeting rooms. Also included are a catering kitchen, four staff offices, a reception and information office, a works examination studio, a gift shop and an art storage area.

The program committee presented a preliminary cost estimate of $3.85 million.

"I think they should say, 'Hey, if you want to come up here and have a good time, if you mess up, you will get nailed to the wall,'" Jackson said.

Manhattan resident Peg Wherry said, "It is important to let people know if you break the law — at any time — you have to accept the consequences, but particularly if you break the law in Aggieville on the weekend of the KU game, there is going to be hell to pay.

"I don't think our community has been outraged enough," Wherry said.

Jackson also suggested shutting down Aggieville, not allowing people to bring anything into the area and installing a stamp system which would identify those over 21 and those between the ages of 18-21.

He said large plastic cups would be distributed to each person who could drink and that would be the only cup they would get for the night.

He said this action would discourage people from either throwing cups or giving them to persons under the legal drinking age.

If they gave the cup away, or threw it, then they couldn't drink anymore, Jackson said.

Other suggestions offered included increasing the amount of fines in Aggieville, using fire trucks, moving the game to night or shutting Aggieville down entirely.

The committee taking the suggestions was formed after the Oct. 18 disturbance in an effort to stop violence from happening for a third time in five years. The KU-K-State football game will be played in Manhattan again in 1987 due to conference scheduling changes.

Suggestions are being compiled at the request of the Manhattan City Commission. The commission is to receive recommendations from the committee after the proposals are reviewed by Schottler and other officers of the Aggieville Merchants Association.

Tentative proposals are to be presented to the commission by mid-December, with final solution ideas to then be compiled and presented to the governing body by early spring.

Horse, dog industries clash on racing issues

Chairmen warn against hurried decisions

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Spokesman for the horse and dog industries in Kansas clashed Wednesday before the Special Committee on Federal and State Affairs, which is studying how best to implement pari-mutuel wagering on racing.

A definite split between the horse and dog factions was evident and the sparks may have been a preview of what the 1987 Legislature can expect when it tackles the controversial issue.

Earlier in the day, the chairmen of key legislative committees which will handle the pari-mutuel legislation warned their colleagues not to move too fast on the issue.

Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth, and Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, said proposals to implement betting on horse and dog racing must be studied carefully rather than rushed through the legislative process.

That did not stop Wayne C. "Rocky" Chambers, president of the Greenwood County Fair Association which owns Eureka Downs, from asking lawmakers to "initiate pari-mutuel at the earliest possible date."

Chambers proceeded to announce his group's plans for use industrial revenue bonds to finance a $7.1 million renovation of the Eureka race track. The plan calls for an enclosed, climate controlled grandstand with seating for 2,500 and concourse space for 3,000 more bettors.

Stables to house an additional 700 horses would be built, along with an 800-car parking lot and facilities for a joint greyhound track.

"A feasibility study has been completed which indicates that with a minimum 100 racing dates, based on an average daily attendance of 2,000, racing activities will generate $4.5 million a year with nearly $1 million in new tax revenues going into the

Dog racing rumors premature, official says

By The Collegian Staff

Although rumors regarding the construction of a race track for dogs in the community have been circulating, officials are not betting on it.

The idea of building a dog track in Manhattan is possible but premature, said Tom Whalen, director of operations for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Whalen said the important issue is that the Kansas Legislature has to put the newly passed pari-mutuel betting amendment into operation. This would involve working on the amendment in further detail to see how it would be adopted in Kansas.

"Nothing will happen very quickly," he said.

The earliest the Legislature would be finished with the amendment would probably be between January and April of next year, Whalen said.

Potential factors that could influence the location of a dog race track could be legislation limiting the number of tracks throughout the state. He said another possible limitation would be restricting tracks to areas meeting specific population rates.

Whalen said he thought the population base of Manhattan and the surrounding communities would be adequate to support a dog race track.

It is important to know not only the costs involved in not only building a track, but also in maintenance after construction, he said.

"I don't know what they're going to do. It is up to the people in the legislation."

Manhattan Mayor Rick Mann said two of the questions that need to be answered are, "Is it feasible?" and "What exactly are the benefits to the area?"

Mann said there is no organizational push at this point to establish a race track for dogs in Manhattan.

The owners of an Aggieville bar were fined $1,100 Nov. 5 for two instances of exceeding the occupancy limit this semester.

Kevin Ladd and Max Strunk, co-owners of Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro St., each were assessed $550 in fines and put on a one-year probation for permitting crowds beyond the approved capacity.

Originally, the tavern was cited for three counts of overcrowding but it was charged in only two instances: Aug. 21 and Sept. 19.

Fowler said police officers have warned him about overcrowding at times.

"We then follow the one in/one out policy," which is a preventative overcrowding measure that allows one person in only when another person has left the bar, he said.

Strunk said if Brother's is charged with overcrowding in the next year, he may be forced to serve a 30-day jail sentence.

Manhattan Mayor Rick Mann said two of the questions that need to be answered are, "Is it feasible?" and "What exactly are the benefits to the area?"

Mann said there is no organizational push at this point to establish a race track for dogs in Manhattan.

Haitians cite overloading for accident

By The Associated Press

MONTROUIS, Haiti — Relatives of t passengers on a crowded ferry boat th sank off La Gonave island gathered on t beach here Wednesday to await word of the kin. At least 131 people drowned or wer missing and feared dead, officials said.

"The boat was loaded top to bottom," sai Thalus St. Fleur, 50, whose cousin was on th boat. "There were people on the top an there were people below deck. There were s many people it was murder."

The ferry, the 50-foot-long wooden Oqu Lele, sank shortly before noon Tuesda about a mile from the wharf in Anse-a-Falet on La Gonave.

Tuesday was market day on La Gonave Most of the passengers on the ferry, whicl shuttles between Montrouis on the mainlanc and La Gonave, were on their way home with goods they had bought to sell on the island.

"We think it (the ferry) was overcrowded," Anais Chavenet, a spokeswoman for the Information Ministry, said in Port-au-Prince, the Haitian capital. It was not immediately known how many people the privately owned ferry was authorized to take on.

Chavenet said the cause of the accident was not known.

The Coast Guard recovered 20 bodies and 111 people were missing and presumed dead, said Christian Theodore, director of the National Disaster Relief Agency in Port-au-Prince. Nineteen people survived, he said.

Miguel Mawfoud, acting director of the Catholic Relief Services, gave different figures. He said 220 people were aboard and 20 of them survived.

Fleur was one of about 30 people who gathered at Montrouis to seek information about relatives.

They said people who had witnessed the accident told them only the passengers on deck had a chance.

Isnel Angrand, a government official on La Gonave, said there was not enough equipment to conduct a proper search and rescue operation.

The only helicopters in Haiti, the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, belong to the army, and their use is restricted. No charter planes or boats were available for hire Wednesday morning.

"I was expecting this to happen at any time," said Angrand. "They tried to cram too many people on these boats."

The relatives gathered at Montrouis said

The owners of an Aggieville bar were fined $1,100 Nov. 5 for two instances of exceeding the occupancy limit this semester.

Kevin Ladd and Max Strunk, co-owners of Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro St., each were assessed $550 in fines and put on a one-year probation for permitting crowds beyond the approved capacity.

Originally, the tavern was cited for three counts of overcrowding but it was charged in only two instances: Aug. 21 and Sept. 19.

Horse, dog industries clash on racing issues

Chairmen warn against hurried decisions

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Spokesman for the horse and dog industries in Kansas clashed Wednesday before the Special Committee on Federal and State Affairs, which is studying how best to implement pari-mutuel wagering on racing.

A definite split between the horse and dog factions was evident and the sparks may have been a preview of what the 1987 Legislature can expect when it tackles the controversial issue.

Earlier in the day, the chairmen of key legislative committees which will handle the pari-mutuel legislation warned their colleagues not to move too fast on the issue.

Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth, and Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, said proposals to implement betting on horse and dog racing must be studied carefully rather than rushed through the legislative process.

That did not stop Wayne C. "Rocky" Chambers, president of the Greenwood County Fair Association which owns Eureka Downs, from asking lawmakers to "initiate pari-mutuel at the earliest possible date."

Chambers proceeded to announce his group's plans for use industrial revenue bonds to finance a $7.1 million renovation of the Eureka race track. The plan calls for an enclosed, climate controlled grandstand with seating for 2,500 and concourse space for 3,000 more bettors.

Stables to house an additional 700 horses would be built, along with an 800-car parking lot and facilities for a joint greyhound track.

"A feasibility study has been completed which indicates that with a minimum 100 racing dates, based on an average daily attendance of 2,000, racing activities will generate $4.5 million a year with nearly $1 million in new tax revenues going into the

Dog racing rumors premature, official says

By The Collegian Staff

Although rumors regarding the construction of a race track for dogs in the community have been circulating, officials are not betting on it.

The idea of building a dog track in Manhattan is possible but premature, said Tom Whalen, director of operations for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Whalen said the important issue is that the Kansas Legislature has to put the newly passed pari-mutuel betting amendment into operation. This would involve working on the amendment in further detail to see how it would be adopted in Kansas.

"Nothing will happen very quickly," he said.

The earliest the Legislature would be finished with the amendment would probably be between January and April of next year, Whalen said.

Potential factors that could influence the location of a dog race track could be legislation limiting the number of tracks throughout the state. He said another possible limitation would be restricting tracks to areas meeting specific population rates.

Whalen said he thought the population base of Manhattan and the surrounding communities would be adequate to support a dog race track.

It is important to know not only the costs involved in not only building a track, but also in maintenance after construction, he said.

"I don't know what they're going to do. It is up to the people in the legislation."

Manhattan Mayor Rick Mann said two of the questions that need to be answered are, "Is it feasible?" and "What exactly are the benefits to the area?"

Mann said there is no organizational push at this point to establish a race track for dogs in Manhattan.

Haitians cite overloading for accident

By The Associated Press

MONTROUIS, Haiti — Relatives of the passengers on a crowded ferry boat that sank off La Gonave island gathered on the beach here Wednesday to await word of their kin. At least 131 people drowned or were missing and feared dead, officials said.

"The boat was loaded top to bottom," said Thalus St. Fleur, 50, whose cousin was on the boat. "There were people on the top and there were people below deck. There were so many people it was murder."

The ferry, the 50-foot-long wooden Oque Lele, sank shortly before noon Tuesday about a mile from the wharf in Anse-a-Falets on La Gonave.

Tuesday was market day on La Gonave. Most of the passengers on the ferry, which shuttles between Montrouis on the mainland and La Gonave, were on their way home with goods they had bought to sell on the island.

"We think it (the ferry) was overcrowded," Anais Chavenet, a spokeswoman for the Information Ministry, said in Port-au-Prince, the Haitian capital. It was not immediately known how many people the privately owned ferry was authorized to take on.

K-State to discontinue promotion of concerts due to Starship failure

By LISA SHEIKH
Collegian Reporter

Due to a more than $13,000 loss on the Starship concert Homecoming weekend, K-State will promote no more concerts in the foreseeable future, said Janice Altland, program adviser for the Special Events Committee.

Starship and all other concerts are planned and budgeted by the Special Events Committee, one of several committees organized by the Union Program Council and supported by the K-State Union.

The Union gives UPC $18,000 each year with which to work, Altland said. The eight committees under the Council must raise all other funds on their own. Special Events, which helps subsidize some of the other committees, was budgeted to earn $9,000 this year. Because of the concert loss, the committee is now $22,000 in the red, she said.

So far this year the committee has sponsored three concerts: the Welcome Back Concert (featuring White Lightning, The Dial Tones, Walk the West, and Johnny Reno and The Sax Maniacs), the Rainmakers and Starship. The first two were not intended to be moneymakers, said Committee Chairwoman Julie Stephens, senior in social sciences. They were budgeted simply as entertainment, and each year the committee schedules some non-profit performances. Starship, however, was intended to bring in profit and contribute to the $9,000 goal for the year.

Stephens attributes poor concert turnout to several factors. "It's a risky business," she said. At K-State, students seem to show interest in only the most well-known groups.

Aside from this, she said the concert was poorly planned by the committee. It was scheduled during both the Univerity's and the high school's homecoming weekend. People were either too tired or too broke when concert time arrived, Stephens said.

Concerts are very difficult to schedule at K-State, Stephens said. She said the University has no facility specifically designated for big events such as concerts, so Special Events has to make arrangements with the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics for the use of Ahearn Field House.

Basically, the committee has two weekends from which to choose: Homecoming and Parents' Weekend. "We have to look at what's available on those two weekends," she said.

Stephens said the committee conducted an informal survey to compare the popularity of various groups. Students in the Union were asked to select their favorite from a list. Starship did fairly well in that survey, Stephens said.

"Starship was, we thought, the best choice we had, and we did look at other groups. We

KCC to hear proposal on Trailways' pullout

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Manhattan will be the site of the first public hearing on Trailways Lines Inc.'s proposal to abandon most of its routes in the state, the Kansas Corporation Commission announced Wednesday.

The KCC has scheduled the hearing for 1:30 p.m. Nov. 24 in the city commission room of Manhattan City Hall to give the public an opportunity to present opinions on the Trailways proposal.

Citing financial difficulties, Trailways on June 30 filed to abandon two Wichita-to-Lincoln, Neb. routes, one of which runs through Manhattan. In August, the bus company filed to drop several other routes, including two that run through Manhattan from Kansas City to Denver.

The commission has until Jan. 20 to make a decision. The meeting in Manhattan will be the first of 17 public hearings along the affected Trailways routes. Dates of the other meetings have not been announced but Steve Menaugh, a KCC spokesman, said they will take place in December.

Under the abandonment requests, the only route the company would retain in the state would run from Kansas City to Wichita via Topeka, Lawrence, Emporia, Augusta, Winfield and Arkansas City.

Manhattan also is served by Greyhound Lines, which runs a route along Interstate 70 from Kansas City to Denver.

Local bar owners receive fine, probation for overcrowding

By PAT HUND

The owners of an Aggieville bar were fined $1,100 Nov. 5 for two instances of exceeding the occupancy limit this semester.

Kevin Ladd and Max Strunk, co-owners of Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro St., each were assessed $550 in fines and put on a one-year probation for permitting crowds beyond the approved capacity.

Originally, the tavern was cited for three counts of overcrowding but it was charged in only two instances: Aug. 21 and Sept. 19.

Although Strunk said Brother's Tavern was warned for overcrowding by fire safety inspectors, he does not think Brother's is the only bar with overcrowding problems.

"I think we were selectively persecuted," Strunk said referring to the fines incurred in the city court.

He said all Aggieville bars were overcrowded when K-State students returned to school in August.

Other bars still exceed the occupancy limit enforced by fire safety officials, Strunk said.

Manhattan Fire Chief Bill Smith said all Manhattan businesses have occupancy load limits based on fire safety and building codes. The number of people allowed in based on these codes is determined in relation to the square footage of the building.

Smith said Brother's was warned about overcrowding several times, but the problem continued.

"When we run into this problem, we will notify them," he said. "Obviously, in the case of Brother's there was constant overcrowding."

"Generally, if we talk to the person in charge, they will take care of the problem," he said.

Smith said "from time to time" during evening hours fire inspection officials will check the occupancy of all Manhattan bars unannounced.

"We try to deal with it fairly, but if there is going to be blatant overcrowding in the bars, action needs to be taken," Smith said.

City fire safety inspectors are required to check premises on all Manhattan businesses for occupancy limits.

According to current regulations, 258 people can be inside Brother's Tavern and an additional 88 people can be in the beer garden, Strunk said.

He would not say how many people were in the bar on the nights it was cited for being overcrowded.

Brother's uses hand counters at the door to keep track of the number of people inside, but it is still hard to know how many people are in the bar, Strunk said.

"You cannot totally control the flow of a crowd at a public assembly," he said.

Smith said police officers and other people have made complaints about overcrowding in Aggieville bars.

Danny Fowler, manager at Dark Horse Tavern, 619 N. Manhattan Ave., said the occupancy limit for the upstairs portion of the tavern is 250 people.

"We use a counter at the front door, and we eyeball the crowd (to keep from overcrowding)," he said.

Aquino seeks aid from Japanese

TOKYO — Philippine President Corazon Aquino on Wednesday urged Japanese business leaders to invest in her country and told them that disagreements in her Cabinet are only the growing pains of a new democracy.

She also addressed a crowd at a university and spoke during a church service in memory of her late husband, Benigno. She was met by hundreds of wellwishers who shouted her nickname, "Cory." The business people gave her a standing ovation.

Aquino arrived in Japan Monday for a four-day visit to seek closer ties between the two countries and more Japanese aid and investment.

Before she left Manila, Philippine troops were placed on alert amid rumors of a possible coup attempt against her 8-month-old government. Troops were also put on alert during previous trips to Indonesia and the United States.

Presidential spokesman Teodoro Benigno told reporters that Aquino described the trip as proceeding "better than expected."

Ex-mayor's wife kills husband, self

WICHITA — The wife of former Wichita Mayor A.E. Howse left a note saying she shot him and then killed herself because she was upset about their declining health, police said.

Police summoned to the couple's apartment shortly before noon Tuesday found the bodies of Howse and Kathryn "K.P." Howse, both 78.

Police Capt. John Dotson said Kathryn Howse shot her husband twice in the head with a .38-caliber revolver as he slept in bed late Monday, then shot herself in the head in the bathroom.

Howse, who was mayor and a city commissioner in the late 1950s, apparently was not aware of her plans, the officer said.

The couple, who had been married more than 50 years, had no children.

KC mayor candidate for transplant

KANSAS CITY — Mayor Jack Reardon of Kansas City, Kan. was declared a candidate for a heart transplant Wednesday by the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Reardon, 43, was entered into the Midwest Organ Bank as a Status 3 candidate, meaning that he was severely ill, but did not require hospitalization. Status 2 candidates are hospitalized and Status 1 candidates are hospitalized in intensive care.

Reardon suffers from cardiomyopathy, a disease which causes deterioration of the heart muscle.

Dr. Marvin Dunn, chief of cardiovascular diseases at the medical center, said Reardon was in a high risk category for sudden death and probably would not live a year without a transplant.

Reardon, who first began experiencing heart problems in 1979, had been hospitalized Oct. 19 when he began coughing up blood. He was released several days later.

It was not possible to say when a heart might be found for Reardon, according to a spokeswoman for the medical center. The wait for some patients at the medical center was a matter of hours while some waited as long as three months, the spokeswoman said.

Financial association elects Finney

TOPEKA — State Treasurer Joan Finney was elected president of the National Association of State Auditors, Comptrollers and Treasurers during a meeting Wednesday in Asheville, N.C.

Steve Hirsch, a spokesman for the Democratic state treasurer, said Finney was installed as president of the association before a crowd of 600 state financial officials from 44 states.

Finney, 61, who was first elected state treasurer in 1974, served last year as the group's first vice president — a position that usually leads to the presidency the following year, Hirsch said.

Mouse forces driver off interstate

BILLINGS, Mont. — A man driving on an interstate highway was attacked by a mouse that apparently had been sleeping in the heater vent of his car and got too hot.

As a result, Walter Miller's car ended up in a ditch near Billings Monday night, and the mouse ended up dead, according to a Montana Highway Patrol report.

Patrolman Dallas Adkins said Miller, 59, of Silesia, was driving home on Interstate 90 when the mouse sprang from the dashboard, landed on his shirt and scampered up inside his coat. That caused Miller to let go of the wheel and grab for the mouse, Adkins said, and he lost control of the car and skidded off the road into the snow.

Miller wasn't hurt, but the patrolman estimated there was $500 damage to the car and four highway reflecter posts.

The confrontation between man, machine and mouse proved fatal to the mouse when Miller grabbed it and squeezed it.

"I have no doubt that's what happened," the patrolman said. "He kept the dead mouse. It was a fresh one."

Sex scene case settles out of court

LOS ANGELES — Two children who watched explicit sex scenes added to a rented videotape of a Walt Disney cartoon, "Silly Symphonies," will receive $9,500 in an out-of-court settlement, a lawyer said.

The settlement was approved last week by San Fernando Superior Court Judge Fred Rimerman after lawyer Jerry L. Webb threatened to sue Wherehouse Records, which rented the video, and Walt Disney Productions, which made it.

Webb, who represents the children's mother, Susan B. Sanders of suburban Northridge, said that Wherehouse and Disney agreed to share the cost of the settlement.

Robert Block, a lawyer for Wherehouse Records, declined to comment on the settlement. He speculated that someone who previously had rented the video might have recorded the sex scenes on the videotape after the end of the Disney movie.

"They (the tapes) are supposed to be tamper-proof. The product was defective. It should have been tamper-proof and should have been inspected," Webb said Wednesday.

Disney spokesman Erwin Okun said Wednesday: "We can't comment because we have never seen that video cassette.... We have no idea how it was manufactured."

The children, ages 6 and 7, suffered behavioral changes and emotional trauma in the weeks after they viewed the sexually explicit scenes on the videotape in February 1985, according to a psychiatric report filed with the court.

"The mother entered the room wondering why the children had not finished the Disney movie" and was shocked when she found them watching explicit sex acts, the psychiatric report said.

Pilot ends transcontinental flight

LONG BEACH, Calif. — A pilot aiming to recreate the nation's first transcontinental flight touched down his flimsy biplane at his destination Wednesday, ending a journey that took 57 days and 101 stops.

Some 150 people, many holding multi-colored balloons, were on hand to welcome modern day barnstormer James R. Lloyd at Long Beach Municipal Airport.

Asked about the most memorable part of his 4,000-mile trek, Lloyd said: "I just finished. Every time I close my eyes I come up with another little scene. In two months, I can tell you what the most memorable part was. My brain is reeling with it right now.

"I saw the whole country from 1,500 feet in an open biplane. I'm not ready to describe it and put it down yet."

Lloyd, who took off from Hoboken, N.J., had hoped to reach Long Beach by Halloween.

His arrival Wednesday was 90 minutes late, primarily because the propeller of the Vin Fiz split when he landed in Pomona earlier in the day.

Hospice workers help families cope with terminal illnesses

By LORI LUGINBILL
Collegian Reporter

The prospects of death and dying are not easy to come to terms with, but a special group in Manhattan is trying to make an extremely difficult process a little easier.

Hospice is a national organization of professional and trained volunteers who provide physical, psychological, social and spiritual services in caring for dying persons and their families.

"Hospice" comes from the Latin word for "host" or "receiver of guests." In contemporary English, it means a place or attitude providing comfort and support for those who are dying and for their loved ones.

"Our aim is to help the patient be comfortable and help the family deal with the crisis so it makes things easier for them," said Barbara Consigli, registered nurse and director of education of Manhattan Hospice.

The group consists of physicians, nurses, ministers and volunteers. Hospice care is provided by a team which consists of the patient and family, six to eight Hospice volunteers, a physician and one nurse, Consigli said.

Each team usually cares for only one patient at a time.

She said when a patient receives a prognosis of about six months or less to live, the patient may request Hospice services. Most of the prognoses are due to cancer.

Consigli said physicians and nurses may not suggest Hospice services to the patient. Usually, the physician will only contact a Hospice member at the patient's request.

A Hospice volunteer will then go to the hospital or home to visit with the patient and family to determine their needs, Consigli said.

Each situation is different, and the services provided may vary, she said. Normal services provided include staying with the patient so the family members can get away for a while, providing transportation, writing letters and listening and reading to the patient.

Hospice volunteers are not required to clean, cook, do laundry or perform professional responsibilities while the patient is at home, but can request such special assistance when it is needed, Consigli said.

"We're really there just to be a friend," she said.

She said it is best to get the patient started with a Hospice team early in their illness so a good relationship can be built between the patient and the volunteer.

"It takes time and hard work to build trust so that the patient and family feel comfortable with the Hospice volunteer. It's a matter of personality pairing. Sometimes it may take three or four visits until both of them feel comfortable," she said.

There are many situations with which the volunteer is trained to help. Whether it is listening to a patient who can't talk to the family because it would upset them or letting the family know it's OK for them to want it all to be over, Hospice volunteers can help, Consigli said.

Members of the team usually meet once a week to review the activities occuring with the patient. A lot of times it may just be keeping in touch by telephone.

To become a Hospice volunteer, interested persons must fill out an application with background information about themselves and why they want to be a Hospice volunteer, she said.

It is helpful if volunteers have cared for terminally ill patients before and have at least three to five hours a week to devote to Hospice work.

Consigli said if someone interested in Hospice has lost a special person within the past year, it's best they wait until they have fully accepted the death before becoming a volunteer.

Each applicant is individually interviewed by Hospice. When applicants are accepted, they must attend seven two-hour training sessions which usually begin in August or September, Consigli said.

During the training period, volunteers will learn about the medical aspects of cancer and its treatment, how to listen, the religious aspects of dying, death and the grieving process and how to help families cope.

Hospice is not a religiously-affiliated group.

"We respect the religious beliefs of each patient and will only contact the minister of the church at a patient's request," she said.

Outsiders may see Hospice as depressing because it deals with a loss, Consigli said. However, there is a lot of humor and laughter, because everyone is dealing with an open acceptance.

"It isn't depressing because you're caring for a person, making them more comfortable so they can enjoy the last part of their life," Consigli said.

Volunteers give a lot of themselves.

"Dying can teach the living, and through this experience we can probably gain more than we give."

U.S. bishops support pope's final decision

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — America's Roman Catholic bishops, after daring to debate the Vatican's punishment of a fellow U.S. prelate, stepped back from confrontation with Rome on Wednesday by declaring the Vatican's verdict "deserves our respect and confidence."

Their decision, after five hours of intense secret talks over two days, said that while the bishops sympathize with the pain of an embattled colleague, the pope in Rome must still come first.

The bishops, all appointed by Pope John Paul II or his predecessors and all subject to church discipline themselves, did not add to the Vatican's criticism of Seattle Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen. But neither did they defend him, as some of his supporters among the group had hoped they might.

"On this occasion the bishops of the United States wish to affirm unreservedly their loyalty to and unity with the Holy Father," Bishop James Malone, president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, said in a statement approved by most of the group's nearly 300 bishops.

"The conference of bishops has no authority to intervene" in the dispute between the Vatican and Hunthausen, he said.

Hunthausen was ordered by the Vatican earlier this year to give up much of his authority to a Rome-appointed auxiliary bishop after Vatican officials judged him too liberal on such matters as ministry to homosexuals and divorced Catholics and dispensation of general absolution for sin to large groups.

He was allowed to make his case to his fellow bishops at the secret sessions — sessions like none other in recent years — and he used the opportunity to complain that "a shroud of secrecy" around the Vatican's investigative process had kept him from even seeing the formal charges against him.

Malone, however, said: "I believe it is clear that the process employed by the Holy See was in accord with general principles of church law and procedures. The decision reached at the end of the process was made by the proper church authorities. As such, it deserves our respect and confidence."

Sources familiar with the debate said the verdict was softened a bit from an earlier version that would have declared the Vatican decision "just and reasonable."

The final statement, said Cardinal John O'Connor of New York, indicated the bishops do not feel "the sky is falling in ... the church is about to explode, there is imminent rebellion on the part of the bishops toward the Holy See."

Also taking a negative view, in an interview before the final closed-door session, Detroit Bishop Thomas Gumbleton said, "Bishops are going to be looking over their shoulders now, and that's not a healthy way to walk."

The bishops' statement said they had "felt much concern" in recent weeks for Hunthausen, for Auxiliary Bishop Donald Wuerl, for the pope and for other high church officials.

"The abuse directed at the Holy Father and the Holy See, the dismay and confusion experienced by many good people — these things are deeply troubling," Malone said.

Line schedule demand depletes supply

First-day distribution totals 5,600

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Bookstore was "pretty hectic" Wednesday as students waited in lines of up to 40 people to pick up free line schedules in preparation for pre-enrollment.

The first 3,000 line schedules were distributed before 11 a.m., and 2,600 more arrived from the printer's at 1 p.m. and were taken by 4 p.m., said John Johnston, senior in management and night manager of the bookstore.

Mary Lou Foster, bookstore manager, expressed concern about the impact on the bookstore.

"It looks bad for the store. We have absolutely nothing to do with it (the processing of line schedules) but dispensing," she said.

"We are on the extreme end, and we are getting the guff," she said. "We are just providing a service for the students by being the distribution point for the line schedules."

As soon as schedules are available from the K-State Printing Service in Kedzie Hall, 15,000 more line schedules will be delivered to the Union, said Gunile Devault, assistant registrar.

The bookstore is distributing free line schedules for the Office of the Registrar, Foster said.

"It was determined last spring that we would no longer charge for the line schedules," said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement. "It was becoming a public relations problem between students and the Union. Students felt they were paying for something that should be provided (without charge)."

Line schedules have been distributed without charge since June 1.

"The Union staff was getting complaints from students who resented the fact that they had to pay for the line schedules," Bosco said.

"The people at the registrar's office worked very hard to see that the plan (free line schedules) was implemented," he said.

Reagan discusses Iranian relations at briefing

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan briefed congressional leaders Wednesday on U.S. relations with Iran while his former national security adviser said the Persian Gulf nation is of "enormous importance" to the security of America and its Western allies.

Neither Reagan nor his spokesmen commented on what was said at the White House session.

It was the first such briefing since the emergence of widespread reports of a purported administration attempt to complete an arms-for-hostages deal with Iran to spring Americans held captive in Lebanon.

"I have not changed my mind," said Senate Democratic leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., after the meeting. Byrd has sharply criticized what he said is the administration's apparent violation of its own policy not to negotiate with terrorists.

Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., had nothing to say and was described by a spokesman as, "tight lipped, no words."

Sen. Patrick Leahy, vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, who was not included in the White House briefing, told reporters he felt administration officials were "groping for a retroactive justification" for the reported dealings with Iran.

The White House, which has never confirmed any such dealings, said Reagan was joined by Vice President George Bush, Secretary of State George P. Shultz, Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger, Attorney General Edwin Meese, CIA Director William Casey, White House chief of staff Donald Regan, and Adm. John Poindexter, Reagan's national security adviser.

In New York, Said Rajaie-Khorassani, Iranian ambassador to the United Nations, strongly denied an arms-for-hostages deal with the United States. He did, however, confirm that his government was receiving U.S.-made military hardware.

"We did not have any arms deal or any other kind of deal with regard to the release of the hostages — with the United States or anyone else," he told a news conference. And he insisted that the "two issues are absolutely separate."

"It is not our affair to set any conditions for the release of the hostages in Lebanon," Rajaie-Khorassani said. But he conceded his Islamic fundamentalist government wields influence among Moslem groups in that Arab country.

Congressional leaders attending the White House briefing were Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas, Senate Democratic leader Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, House Democratic leader Jim Wright of Texas and Rep. Dick Cheney of Wyoming, chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee.

Senate to discuss KU-K-State football crowds

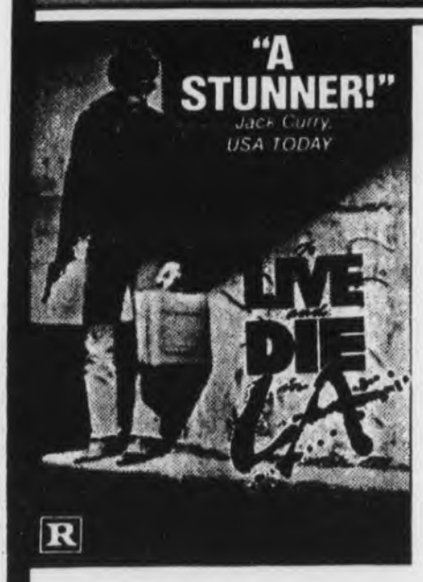
By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate is scheduled to discuss crowd control for future football games at tonight's meeting.

Senate will hear recommendations concerning crowd control at next year's K-State-University of Kansas football game, scheduled to be played in Manhattan again next year due to changes in conference scheduling.

In related action, a letter has been sent out to Kansas newspapers regarding this year's disturbance in Aggieville.

The letter, signed by Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, senior in marketing, defended the University and its students. It explained how the disturbance was caused not only by K-State students, but by people from throughout eastern Kansas who had come for the "riot."



The letter, which has the signatures of several Senate members on an accompanying sheet of paper, assures the public that Senate and the University will not allow a similar disturbance to occur again.

During last week's Senate meeting, Traeger said "This problem has become more serious than you think."

She also said the disturbance has also resulted in several letters concerning the discontinuation of contributions to KSU Foundation.

Senate will also hear first reading tonight of a bill concerning allocations for the Royal Purple, which is seeking additional funding for pictures.

Children of veterans benefit from concert

Many jumped on the "bandwagon" in support of the Youth for Vietnam Veterans concert Tuesday in Kansas City, Mo., including President Ronald Reagan and Gov. John Carlin.

The concert's performers, John Fogerty, Stephen Stills and George Thorogood, donated their performances to the cause, and tickets sold for $17.50 plus a service charge.

The concert was originally scheduled for Nov. 11 at Allen Field House on the University of Kansas campus, but due to the great response it was moved to Memorial Auditorium in Kansas City.

The group, which originated at KU, wanted to show veterans and their families that they, and others, sympathized with their difficulties and suffering. The money collected from the festivities will be given to a scholarship fund administered by the Paralyzed Veterans of America for the children of those servicemen disabled, killed or missing in action.

The group, as well as the performers and concert-goers, should be applauded for their support and understanding of the sons and daughters of veterans.

The money generated from this concert will benefit these children in one of the most valuable ways: it will challenge and expand their minds, an opportunity they might not have had without the generosity and empathy of groups such as those who organized and participated in this concert.

Art gallery could aid concept of University

They can take away some of the University's arts and sciences curriculums, but they can't take away its culture.

Despite apparent efforts of the Kansas Board of Regents to make K-State into a technical institution rather than a university, President Wefald and his administration are adamantly promoting the construction of a campus art museum and gallery.

About 1,000 works of art are housed at various locations around campus. Some are stored in closets or attics — valuable, appealing artwork that could enhance the campus.

The collection — somewhat of a misnomer until it is brought under one roof — contains graphic art, paintings, sculpture, ceramics, textiles and photography. Works of well-known artists including Henri Matisse, Salvador Dali, Thomas Hart Benton, John Steuart Curry and Grant Wood are included in the collection.

If the University wants to increase its appeal to visitors, it must develop features that are visually appealing and interesting to a wide range of people. The art museum would become part of the composite experience of visitors. Although it cannot be the main attraction, it can supplement other attractions such as the Union, Durland Hall, athletic events and McCain events.

Of the three locations proposed for the museum — an addition to McCain Auditorium, an addition to the Union, or a free-standing structure east of McCain — the latter is preferable. The building to contain the art museum should itself be an artistic work. It should also include plans for expansion if the University's art collection or curriculum were to grow.

Plans for the structure appear all-inclusive. It should be seen as both an academic and aesthetic boost for the University. This project should receive nothing but support from students, faculty and the Regents.

Yugoslavia tarnishes human rights

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

One criticism I often hear is of my own double standard of criticism. That is, that I am quick to condemn the United States for human rights violations, belligerent behavior and disinformation, while remaining silent about the same things done by other governments — especially the Soviet Union and its allies.

But it's not just because I live, vote and pay taxes here that I expect better behavior from the U.S. government. Call it the myth of representative government, which states that if one complains loud and long enough, things will change. So while President Reagan is about as willing to listen to me as General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev, at least I can speak to the people who elected Reagan and his lackeys and hope to change their minds.

Yes, I am aware that there are human rights violations in the Eastern-bloc nations, and no, I don't keep quiet about them out of some sort of fondness for totalitarian governments. It just seems that harping on the lack of personal freedoms in Eastern Europe has a tendency to degenerate into the pointless red-baiting typical of William F. Buckley Jr. and others with considerably less talent.

There are times, however, when a little publicity can have an effect — even on the relatively closed societies of East-bloc nations. I hope the case of Ismet Kasumagic is one of those times.

On March 24, 1983, Ismet Kasumagic, an ethnic Muslim and professor of metallurgy at the University of Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, was arrested with 12 other ethnic Muslims. The group was charged with "hostile and counterrevolutionary acts from a position of Muslim nationalism." Upon completion of the pre-trial investigation June 18, the suspects were allowed to meet with lawyers for the first time since their arrests — despite provisions of Yugoslav law which guarantee a defendant the right to legal assistance at any stage of legal proceedings.

One month and one day later, Kasumagic's trial began. To support the charges of "hostile and counterrevolutionary acts," the prosecution relied on statements Kasumagic was said to have made between 1975 and 1983 — all of which were made in private conversations between Kasumagic and one or two other people.

He was accused of slandering members of the League of Communists by saying that they were a privileged elite, of saying that Muslim children should be given Muslim names and be raised according to Muslim rules, of arguing that Muslims were discriminated against and that they had no future in Yugoslavia.

He allegedly said Iraq would have lost the war with Iran in seven days if not for Yugoslav aid to Iraq, and that the Iranian revolution would lead to an improved situation for Muslims in Yugoslavia. One of the more controversial statements allegedly made by Kasumagic was that Bosnia-Hercegovina, the republic where Kasumagic lived and worked, should be an ethnically pure Muslim republic, as well as other statements praising the Iranian revolution.

While I don't necessarily agree with Kasumagic's statements, I could hardly call them "hostile and counterrevolutionary." At no time did Kasumagic use or advocate violence.

Although the Yugoslav Constitution guarantees freedom of opinion, freedom of the press and other media information, freedom of association, freedom of speech and public expression, freedom of assembly, freedom of religious profession, freedom of movement and abode, inviolability of the home, and confidentiality of mail and other means of communication, the statements Kasumagic allegedly made in his own home were used against him.

All of these constitutional freedoms are voided by Article 133 of the criminal code. Part of Article 133 states, "Whoever maliciously and untruthfully portrays socio-political conditions in the country shall be punished by imprisonment for from one to 10 years." Kasumagic was sentenced to 10 years, which was later reduced to eight on appeal.

On July 4, 1984, the Manhattan chapter of Amnesty International adopted Kasumagic as a prisoner of conscience, someone imprisoned for his or her religious or political beliefs who has not advocated the use of violence. Amnesty's record of securing the release of prisoners of conscience has been surprisingly successful at times, and that is why I think the case of Ismet Kasumagic will not fall on deaf ears.

Friday, Amnesty International will collect signatures during the noon hour in the Union. The petitions will be sent to the Yugoslav government official in charge of pardons and it is hoped they will have an effect, as Kasumagic's wife has been unable to find work since her husband's arrest.

Meanwhile, because of his opinions, Kasumagic remains behind bars in Venica Prison.

Pedestrians, drivers need patience

ERIC CROWELL
Guest Columnist

With all the controversy concerning the crosswalk situation on campus, I couldn't help writing a few reflections of my own concerning a crosswalk that I am all too familiar with. Put yourself in my shoes for a moment, if you will. You live in Goodnow or Marlatt Hall and you are late for class. You rush out the front door and down the walk and suddenly, you must come to a complete stop and wait for what seems like an eternity for it.

What is it? Is it political fanatics trying to persuade you to help overthrow the K-State Student Governing Association? No. Perhaps it is a funeral procession on Denison Avenue. No, that would be faster than it. It might even be a campus police car blocking traffic while the officer tickets a car that is an inch into the "no parking" zone. While this is a likely situation, it is still not the problem.

What is the problem? The long train of cars that whizzes by hundreds of helpless pedestrians patiently waiting on the curb for some law-abiding driver to stop at the crosswalk like he is supposed to.

If you are one of the 1,064 people who live in Goodnow or Marlatt, you are probably familiar with this problem. Countless days I have waited until the coast is clear for miles to cautiously walk out into the street, hoping that no one decides to turn onto Denison and make me sorry I ever thought about stepping into "their space."

Perhaps the drivers are not familiar with the law. Taking this into consideration, I decided to look up the correct interpretation of the law in the "Handbook — Driver License Renewal Examination" as published by the Kansas Department of Revenue — Division of Vehicles. If this booklet sounds familiar to you, it should, especially if you have a Kansas driver's license. It is the condensed version of booklet that you should have reviewed before getting your license and the one that you must review when reapplying for your new license every four years. This is what it states:

"Drivers Must Yield to Pedestrians...When they are in a marked or unmarked crosswalk (if there are no traffic control signals)."

It's stated pretty straightforward if you ask me. However, as straightforward as it is, I believe that it seems all too easy for drivers to claim "ignorance of the law" when they do not obey it. When I first began thinking of what we should do to rectify the problem, I thought that a traffic light at the crosswalk would be the only answer.

We have all seen these traffic lights. Drivers curse at them because by the time they change from red to green, the pedestrian could well be into the next county. They are aggravating because they rely on time instead of common sense, like the current crosswalk could operate on. They are much more expensive than the painted stripes and yellow signs. Finally, they are not necessary where drivers respect their pedestrian counterparts. In talking with Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police, I realized that they can cause more problems than they solve.

For one thing, Beckom pointed out that the crosswalk lights are integrated into the system of lights along the street and when the button is pushed, the reaction time may be delayed while the other traffic lights are synchronized to coincide with the crosswalk light. A good example of this problem exists on the crosswalk across Anderson Avenue between the University Inn and Nichols Hall. If the light is not timed correctly, it could stop traffic up into the intersection of Denison and Anderson, or back traffic up into the intersections near Aggieville. Because of the extra time involved in this synchronization, many pedestrians become impatient and "run the light," causing more danger than if no traffic light were there. It is because of the liability at stake that the city and University are often apprehensive about putting in traffic lights like the one on Anderson.

I also learned that the drivers are not the only problem. Pedestrians who neglect to use the crosswalk and cut across wherever they feel like it, frustrate drivers to the point that by the time they reach the crosswalk, all they really feel like doing is getting out of the situation by speeding through the congested section.

I asked Beckom what he believed was the solution. The answer should not surprise any of us: cooperation and patience on the part of both pedestrian and driver. If you are a driver and you see someone stepping into a crosswalk, if it is reasonably safe to stop, then stop, let the pedestrian go by and resume at normal speed. You do not have to floor the gas after passing a pedestrian — we know that you are more powerful than we are.

If you are a pedestrian, try not to step in front of a car that you believe may not be able to stop. A driver who doesn't believe he has enough room to comfortably stop is not obligated to slam on his or her brakes and have an accident trying to stop. And when someone does stop for you, try to let them know your appreciation. It is not that hard to give a quick smile or wave. During busy times, stop and let a few cars go by before trodding ahead. They were kind enough to stop for someone; now you should be kind enough to return the favor.

Also, use the crosswalks. Most pedestrians are also drivers and understand how frustrating and nerve-racking it is when someone darts out in front of traffic because it is shorter than walking 15 or 20 feet to the nearest crosswalk.

Perhaps being aware of the other person's position will help this situation more than any type of traffic control device. After all, isn't human nature far more effective than brute authority?

Damaging reputation

Editor,

We are writing to dispel what we know is unwarranted and factually incorrect speculation. As residents of the University community in Manhattan, we are concerned primarily with the few but still unfortunate incidences of personal injury as well as the extensive property damage incurred by business owners and Riley County taxpayers. These were the obvious and tangible violations we could see the day after approximately 5,000 people immigrated Oct. 18 into a two-square block business district we call Aggieville.

We are upset that, once again, our University community was put into upheaval by the actions of a few intoxicated, immature people. At first, we echoed the disappointment expressed two years ago after a similar, yet more severe incident coined "the Aggieville riot." We knew we would have quite a job ahead of us just preventing what has apparently become the result of a much-publicized rivalry. And, at first, we weren't going to send a letter of this nature to every newspaper in Kansas. But now, our greatest concern outreaches even these first reactions.

Now, the more obvious violation which has been escalated over the last three weeks is the one committed by those who assume the actions of a few are the attitudes of all. Further, this injustice has been magnified by those who assume, or want to believe, this incident involved only or even a majority of K-State students.

It is painfully obvious that we underestimated the effect of widespread publicity. Not in our wildest dreams did we imagine a state rivalry would attract students from other universities and residents of other communities not to the football game, but to the anticipated "riot" in the streets of Aggieville. After all, isn't that an absurd notion? Who wants to risk life and limb by pursuing aggression? Apparently, some of the 5,000 people in Aggieville that night did. This became more real when the chairman of Student Senate asked a friend from another state university if she was in town for the game. She replied, "No, I came up for the riot!"

Without doting on a well-worn controversy, we want to express very clearly only this: the truly absurd notion is that Kansas State University students were solely involved in an incident that some media have managed to once again blow out of proportion.

To the K-Staters who were involved, we express our disappointment and disgust. To everyone who aggravated, if not created, the situation, please never again feel free to come to our University community if you must damage our property, injure anyone and subsequently taint the reputation of an entire university and its students. Anonymity does not give anybody, K-State student or not, that right.

Court renews study on affirmative action

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, renewing its study of affirmative action in the American workplace, was urged Wednesday to strictly control preferential treatment for women and minorities in job promotions.

The Reagan administration led the assault on affirmative action plans in cases from Alabama and California as the justices for the first time directly examined job preferences for women.

Solicitor General Charles Fried, the administration's chief courtroom lawyer, said a court-ordered plan for promoting equal numbers of black and white state troopers in Alabama was "profoundly illegal" even though only a few jobs were at stake.

He argued that the court order aimed at correcting past employment discrimination by the state police was excessive in punishing innocent white troopers seeking promotion.

But J. Richard Cohen of Montgomery, Ala., representing the black troopers, said the federal judge who ordered the one-for-one promotion plan sought to overcome "a history of recalcitrance" by the state police department.

The judge sought to end years of "foot dragging," said Cohen.

In the second case, the Santa Clara County Transportation Agency promoted a woman to dispatcher over a man deemed more qualified. A federal appeals court upheld the move as a means of overcoming the absence of women in higher-ranking agency jobs, although there was no court finding that the agency discriminated against women.

The Supreme Court is expected to announce rulings by July in both cases, answering lingering questions over the future of affirmative action.

In the California case, Paul Johnson, a 57-year-old highway worker with 30 years experience, lost out in 1980 when Diane Joyce, a 42-year-old widow with four children, was promoted to dispatcher.

Constance E. Brooks of Denver, Johnson's attorney, said there was no evidence the county previously had discriminated against women.

An affirmative action plan must be based on something more than "societal and attitudinal reasons," she said. "You can't force women into non-traditional jobs. If they want them, it should be based on merit."

However, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested that employers, without admitting past bias, should be allowed to redress possible discrimination to head off suits by women and minorities.

She asked whether an employer may adopt affirmative action programs if it "has a firm basis to believe it will be subject" to a lawsuit.

Joyce was promoted under a plan adopted by Santa Clara County in 1978 at a time when not one of its 238 skilled craft jobs was held by a woman. The plan called for assigning 36 percent of the agency's jobs to women, minorities and the handicapped.

Johnson said he was more qualified than Joyce for a road dispatcher's job because he scored two points higher on an oral examination and because examiners who conducted the test unanimously recommended him for promotion.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in dismissing his suit, said the affirmation action plan is constitutional because it is aimed at breaking down a long-standing imbalance between men and women in the agency's workforce.

In the Alabama case, state police officials were ordered by a federal judge in 1984 to promote eight black troopers and eight white troopers to corporal.

The case began in 1972 when the police department was charged with discriminating against blacks.

Cohen, the black troopers' lawyer, said the judge ordered the one-for-one promotion plan as a temporary move to spur compliance with affirmative action goals. The quota "compensated for department delays," said Cohen. "It was a mechanism to insure that an intolerable situation would not recur and to end the foot dragging."

But Fried said police officials already were taking steps to help blacks by proposing a promotion plan pegged to the blacks' 25 percent representation on the force.

The one-for-one promotion ratio "bears no relationship to anything," Fried said. "I'm simply asking the court to compare it to alternative" remedies, he said.

Haig announces presidential intentions

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Former Secretary of State Alexander Haig Jr. said Wednesday he intends to seek the 1988 Republican presidential nomination in an effort to "keep the Reagan revolution alive."

"I intend to run," Haig, who has indicated presidential ambitions before, told executives of the General Electric Credit Corp. "As of today, I have no doubt about it. And I intend to make an announcement sometime early next year."

Haig, 61, a retired NATO commander, then added: "That could change. I don't need the job. I really don't. In fact, I've learned the secret of life ... it's in marketing. And that's what I'm doing today — marketing."

After leaving the Reagan administration in 1982, Haig served as president of United Technologies Corp. and has since created his own consulting firm, Worldwide Associates of Washington, D.C.

"I happen to believe that if I could ever get nominated, I could be elected," Haig told 320 executives at the meeting.

Although he promised he would continue the Reagan revolution, Haig later indicated in his speech that he would distance himself from the administration if he does pursue the presidency.

"As a Republican, quite frankly, I'm rathered embarrassed that we Republicans in the last five years have accomplished the impossible. We managed, despite fiscally responsible rhetoric, to double our national debt from $1 trillion in 1981 to $2 trillion this year, as we once again face a $200 billion deficit despite the mirage of Gramm-Rudman."

New program helps beginning teachers

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

A new program offered by the College of Education provides help to beginning teachers who have questions or problems in the classroom.

"It was an idea that was discussed last year that came up because students would come to K-State for four years and go out into the field with not much of a support system," said Elizabeth Simons, graduate student in education curriculum and instruction and director of the First-Year Teacher Resource Program.

Those teachers the program was specifically designed for are first- or second-year teachers, individuals who do substitute teaching, and teachers that have switched grade levels, schools or have just moved to the Kansas area.

"We are focusing on K-State students and graduates, but we will provide assistance to any teacher who asks for it," Simons said.

The program began in August with seminars at K-State and other cities throughout Kansas. In these informal sessions, teachers share ideas, talk about their experiences and discuss possible solutions to problems, Simons said.

A seminar was held Wednesday in Topeka, and another is scheduled Saturday in Kansas City, Kan., Simons said.

Future seminars will have a more formal structure with programs addressing topics of concern to teachers, she said. The main areas of concern teachers have expressed are student motivation and ways to provide enriching and remedial material for the students, Simons said.

A telephone referral service is also provided by the program. This is a toll-free number teachers can call with questions. Many calls have been received dealing with teacher recertification requirements, discipline problems and general curriculum questions, Simons said.

Another service the program aims to provide is a computer-based network. This would benefit rural first-year teachers who may be the only instructor in an area for a particular subject.

The network will put them in contact with other teachers in the same curriculum or situation in a nearby location, Simons said.

This way teachers can share ideas and supplies, and have help putting their programs together for the year. A data base of teacher information has to be gathered before this part of the program can take place, Simons said.

Letters and posters were sent to every principal in the state explaining the program and which teachers are eligible to use it.

Principals were asked to send a list of teachers at their schools to K-State for the records. So far more than 500 names have been collected, Simons said.

"This is not for teachers in trouble. The whole idea is some teachers have war stories about their first year and don't know who to turn to," Simons said.

The University is not involved in the certification or evaluation of teachers after graduation so the program provides a non-threatening situation for them to ask for help, Simons said.

The program was designed to provide "practical" advice for teachers, Simons said.

"They learn a lot of theory in school, and the program is there to help them apply that theory in their jobs," she said.

Drug improves Alzheimer's patients' memories

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — An experimental drug for Alzheimer's disease significantly improved the memories of 16 of 17 senile people treated in a study, and may be the first effective therapy for this devastating illness of old age, a researcher says.

Elderly people who did not know their sons and daughters or even their own names were able to recognize their families again after taking the pills. One less severely affected man went back to work part-time. A retiree who before could barely speak took up daily golf again, while another victim resumed driving, cooking and cleaning her house.

"If this is validated, I think we will have our first viable treatment for Alzheimer's," said Dr. William K. Summers, who directed the study.

The drug is not available for routine use. It cannot be prescribed by physicians. Until researchers learn more about it, the medicine will be given only to small numbers of people enrolled in carefully controlled studies.

Summers, an assistant professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, based his conclusions on the treatment of people with moderate to severe Alzheimer's senility.

"Of these 17," Summers said, "four of them got dramatically better, seven got clearly better and five of them got better to anybody's eye."

Summers said that his findings are encouraging but still preliminary, and he stressed that the drug does not cure Alzheimer's disease. Instead, it eases the symptoms of the disease, much as insulin controls diabetes or L-dopa relieves Parkinson's disease.

The results were published in today's New England Journal of Medicine, along with an editorial by Dr. Kenneth L. Davis, an Alzheimer's expert at Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York.

In an interview, Davis was cautious about the drug's potential. It's not "a golden bullet," he said. "It do think this drug will help some people, and there is a market for it. I see it as a short, rational step" toward controlling Alzheimer's disease.

He noted that similar drugs have failed to produce dramatic results, and he suggested that Summers' findings might result from fortunate selection of study subjects and careful monitoring of the patients' drug levels.

The experimental drug, called tetrahydroaminoacrine, or THA, was discovered in 1909 and first given to Alzheimer's victims in a pilot study by Summers eight years ago.

Summers said he is trying to obtain a patent on the medicine's use so that a drug company will take over the expensive job of testing it and obtaining approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. He said he approached four drug houses, and none was willing to take on the medicine, since without a patent they would not have exclusive rights to sell it.

Summers said he fears his encouraging results will touch off "mass hysteria" for the drug, particularly since no one knows when, or even if, it will be approved.

Alzheimer's disease is the primary cause of senility among the elderly. An estimated 1.5 million to 3 million Americans have the illness, and it causes more than 100,000 deaths each year.

During his study, Summers found that when the drug was withdrawn, patients' symptoms of senility returned. In the latest phase of the research to test the long-term effects, 12 people have taken THA for an average of 13 months.

The most extremely affected cases became able to feed themselves, go to the bathroom on their own, know their names and recognize their families. Those who would sit with dazed expressions began carrying on conversations again.

Pentagon to restrict Soviet access to U.S. data

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Defense Department is studying ways to limit access to unclassified computerized government and commercial data banks in an effort to make it difficult for the Soviet bloc to gather such information.

The data banks contain items ranging from news stories to highly technical scientific research papers.

One Pentagon official, discussing the project on condition he not be identified, said the study is focusing initially on two government-run services, the Defense Technical Information Center and the National Technical Information Service.

But executives with private electronic data banks say they have been approached in recent months by officials from the Pentagon, Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation, asking how controls might be placed on subscribers to their systems.

"They were all asking questions about whether we can deny access," said Jack W. Simpson, president of Mead Data Central Inc., a major commercial operator of computerized data banks such as Nexis, which catalogues news stories from a variety of publications.

"We don't believe they have a right to put a muzzle on us, and we don't believe these are the right folks to make such decisions," he said.

"They are apparently suggesting monitors and controls on electronic distribution systems in the private sector to control information going to the Soviets."

The issue of controlled access to data banks has simmered within the administration for several years. In September, 1984 President Reagan directed the Pentagon to study the ways the Soviets gain access to information in the West and what might be done to impede them.

The issue came to a head on Tuesday night in New York at a convention of the Information Industry Association. Panelists Diane Fountaine, director for information systems in the office of Assistant Defense Secretary Donald C. Latham, informed her audience:

"The question is not will there be restrictions or controls on the use of commercially available on-line data bases — the question is how will such restrictions or controls be applied?"

In an interview Wednesday, Fountaine said she was attempting to inform the industry that "we are very serious about protecting information, including unclassified but sensitive information."

Film relies on bizarre, sordid visuals

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Something's amiss in Small Town, America. There's something strange going on behind those white picket fences and white clapboard walls. This is the premise in director David Lynch's newest film, "Blue Velvet." The movie takes us into a small town filled with flower gardens, birdbaths, and neatly manicured lawns and shows us everything isn't as nice and wholesome as we might believe.

Film Review

"Blue Velvet" starts off innocently, with a close-up of flowers swaying in a gentle breeze. Behind them is a perfectly white picket fence and a perfectly blue sky. A middle-age man is watering his lawn when suddenly his face contorts and he falls to the ground in agony. As he lies on the ground, the neighbor's dog jumps on his chest and laps at the water shooting from the garden hose.

Nightmare-like images impressive

Next director Lynch cuts to an extreme close-up of the lawn. The camera moves through the grass as if the lawn were a jungle, until we find bugs, dozens and dozens of bugs, locked in combat, their struggles creating a deafening roar.

This first scene is a key to what will soon follow in the movie. It tells us "Blue Velvet" is about the horrible things hidden from our sight, things that are vile, but at the same time peversely interesting.

From here the movie introduces us to the main character, Jeffrey (Kyle MacLachlan). While walking through an empty lot, he discovers a severed human ear covered with red ants. He picks it up and takes it to the police. They comb the field for clues, but they don't really get anywhere in the investigation.

Jeffrey is curious, though, so he becomes an amateur sleuth. He finds out the police have been investigating a torch singer named Dorothy (Isabella Rossellini), so he decides to sneak into her apartment and look for clues. While he's there, she comes home. With no way out, Jeffrey hides in the closet and watches as a man enters the apartment and physically abuses Dorothy. This man, Frank (Dennis Hopper), is a drug dealer who has kidnapped Dorothy's husband and son to ensure her sexual submission.

That's just the beginning of "Blue Velvet," but it's enough to send many filmgoers running for the lobby. Yes, the film is definitely cruel and maybe even obscene at times, but director David Lynch is so in control of the images that the film transcends its own sordidness.

This obsession with the seamy and the grotesque is nothing new for Lynch. His previous films ("Eraserhead," "Dune," and "Elephant Man") have all emphasized these qualities in varying degrees.

At times the movie takes on the same nightmare-like quality of Lynch's cult classic "Eraserhead." This happens in the apartment building where Dorothy lives. Here the corridors are shabby and shadowy. Colors are muted, so all that exists are browns, greys, and violets. And in the background there is an continuous mechanical hum.

If it weren't for the film's impressive visuals, "Blue Velvet" might not be much of a film at all. Lynch has never been much of a storyteller. His real strength is in creating bizarre images. Because of this, "Blue Velvet" is never quite as compelling as the flashy cinematic touches promise it to be. Instead of picking up momentum as the story nears its climax, "Blue Velvet" coasts to a conclusion.

The movie is impressive in the sense that Lynch has made his nightmare visions come to life, but the movie seems to be made for those people obsessed with decadence.

Misunderstanding hurt Swiss toxic spill alert

By The Associated Press

ZURICH, Switzerland — Switzerland conceded Wednesday to top officials from countries along the Rhine that a misunderstanding delayed an international alert for 24 hours after a disastrous toxic spill from a chemical plant fire.

Swiss President Alphons Egli told the meeting that Switzerland was ready to discuss damage claims by countries affected and that he hoped they could be settled without legal action, said a West German delegation spokesman.

The spokesman spoke on condition of anonymity.

About 30 tons of agricultural chemicals — insecticides, herbicides and mercury-containing fungicides — washed into the Rhine on Nov. 1 when firefighters doused a blaze at a Sandoz chemical plant warehouse near Basel, Switzerland, and caused an environmental crisis.

Sandoz spokesman Edgar Fasel was quoted Wednesday as dismissing a report cited by the Greens, the West German environmentalist party, which said a Swiss insurance company warned Sandoz management five years ago of safety lapses at the plant.

A 25-mile-long slick of chemicals drifted downstream along the 820-mile Rhine, killing an estimated 500,000 fish and eels, harming other aquatic life and endangering drinking water.

Swiss television said a purported Swiss branch of West Germany's Red Army Faction terrorist gang claimed Wednesday it set the Sandoz fire. It said an anonymous telephone caller claiming to speak for "Group Switzerland" told the network and the Swiss tabloid Blick it planted an incendiary device at the plant four days before the fire.

Toni Thuering, a Basel state official heading the fire probe, said he doubted the claim but that arson was a possibility.

Swiss television said the call came from Loerrach, West Germany, across the border from Basel.

The Swiss statement about the alert delay was distributed at a closed-door meeting called by Switzerland in response to strong criticism for its handling of the emergency.

Attending were environment ministers from France, West Germany and the Netherlands. Luxembourg and the Common Market also sent representatives.

Major topics on the table were requests for further information from Switzerland and ways to tighten cooperation in future emergencies.

The Swiss delegation announced during a break that further talks were set for Dec. 19 in the Dutch city of Rotterdam.

Basel authorities said the international Rhine pollution emergency center at Mannheim, West Germany, assured them it was aware of the spill hours before actually sounding an alarm. The statement did not explain the misunderstanding.

Dutch Waterways Minister Neelie Smit-Kroes reportedly told the meeting her government's administrative costs alone for dealing with the disaster totaled about $300,000.

In Bonn, spokesman Friedhelm Ost said West Germany is working on a damage estimate.

In Paris, six French ecological organizations called Wednesday for a boycott of Sandoz, so other chemical companies will "learn what it will cost them" if they cause an accident similar to the Rhine's pollution.

Education board to discuss school aid increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The State Board of Education received tentative legislative proposals today that call for a massive $61.7 million boost in state community college funding over the next five years and a $25 million increase next year in aid to local school districts.

The recommendations were included in report the board's Legislative Committee today approved and advanced to the full board, which is scheduled to consider the package on Thursday.

Aid to the state's 19 community colleges would increase by slightly more than $9 million during the fiscal year that begins July 1, according to a recommendation aimed at increasing the state's share of funding to 60 percent of the schools' combined budgets by 1992.

In subsequent years, state aid would increase between $11.8 million and $14.6 million annually under the proposal, which was developed from a report this summer of the Community College Funding Task Force.

State aid to the schools this year totals about $27 million and amounts to 22.23 percent of the money the colleges plan to spend. Under the proposal, when state funding reaches 60 percent of the school's combined budgets, 25 percent of the remaining money would be raised through local taxes and 15 percent would come from student tuition.

Under the aid plan for the state's 304 school districts, teacher salaries could increase by around 4 percent depending upon local school board decisions. The recommendation would increase general state aid by 5.5 percent, or $25 million, during the 1987-88 school year, compared to $10 million in new aid money the Kansas Legislature approved for the current school year.

Dale Dennis, assistant education commissioner for finance, said the proposal would increase total state aid for local districts from the current $452.5 million to $477.5 million.

The plan would allow local school districts to increase their budgets by 2 percent if they are above the statewide median in per-pupil expenditures and 3.5 percent if they are below the median. The proposal would require a statewide property tax increase of $32 million.

The board today voted to include in the package of legislative recommendations a $1 million plan to help local districts assist students considered to be "at risk."

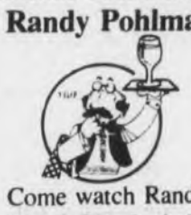
The "at risk" category includes dropouts, juvenile delinquents, students who are parents, students with numerous unexcused absences, students who are behind their age group in obtaining credits toward graduation, students who have failed at least one grade level or who have not obtained passing scores on the Kansas Minimum Competency Test.

Members of the Department of Education staff said the program probably would require local districts to pay 25 percent of the cost and the proportion of the local match would increase to about 75 percent after three years.

Another proposal in the package calls for including 3-year-old handicapped children who receive special education services in the enrollment formula used to calculate state aid to local school districts.

Board member Connie Hubbell, a Topeka Republican who is chairwoman of the board's legislative committee, said the plan would cost an extra $900,000 next year. She said the recommendation is aimed at meeting a federal mandate to cover 3-year-old special education students in state aid formulas by 1990.

Kansas currently includes only 4- and 5-year-old students in aid formulas. Hubbell said states that do not meet the mandate face the loss of federal special education funds for 3- to 5-year-old children.



A memo prepared for the committee said Kansas could lose $1 million in federal special education funds it now receives for that age group, and special education programs for handicapped preschoolers at state universities would be lose funding.

Copperfield to mystify Manhattan

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Millions of viewers have watched him on television — a tall, dark, elegant man, who, with an air of drama and theatrical style, has achieved such magical feats as making the Statue of Liberty disappear and walking through the Great Wall of China seem as simple as buttering a slice of bread.

Now local audiences will have a chance to see David Copperfield's magic live at McCain Auditorium in shows at 5 and 8 p.m. on Saturday.

Copperfield has been called one of the greatest magicians of our time, his unique and astounding theatrical illusions delighting and mystifying audiences in live and televised performances for almost 10 years.

Once a shy boy in New Jersey, David Copperfield, formerly David Kotkin, was first introduced to magic as a youth to help him overcome his reserved nature.

"I started out doing ventriloquism because I really didn't have many friends. That provided almost a companion, like a normal child," Copperfield said in a USA Today interview. "But I wasn't a very good ventriloquist. I got more approval from doing magic. It really helped me bridge that communication gap."

By the age of 12, he had developed such a mastery of the art that he became the youngest person ever admitted to the Society of American Magicians. Later, at age 16, he taught his own magic course at New York University.

When he was cast as the lead in the musical "The Magic Man," it was suggested that Copperfield adopt his present name. With Copperfield performing and creating the magic for the show, "The Magic Man" became the longest running musical comedy in Chicago's history.

Copperfield's first television break came when he was selected to host "The Magic of ABC," a show previewing the network's fall lineup. CBS executives were so impressed with Copperfield they offered him his own television special, "The Magic of David Copperfield," which aired in 1978. More CBS specials followed, with Copperfield surprising television audiences with a new and more spectacular "grand finale" to end each special.

In special four, Copperfield made a 7-ton, $2 million jet disappear. In his fifth special, Copperfield made the Statue of Liberty disappear before a live audience. In his sixth special, he levitated himself over the Grand Canyon. In 1985, Copperfield's special took place in China, where he walked through the ancient brick barrier, the Great Wall.

His vanishing of the Statue of Liberty, acclaimed as the "illusion of the century," was first considered to be used as an illusion because it was a challenge. Later, Copperfield realized that the magical spectacle could be used for another reason.

"Sometimes, we don't realize how important something is until it's gone. I thought if we faced emptiness, where for as long as we can remember that great lady has lifted her lamp, we might imagine what the world would be like without liberty — and we'd realize how precious our freedom really is."

Jan Fisher, one of Copperfield's publicity representatives, said Copperfield is currently editing his latest special, which will air on CBS sometime this spring.

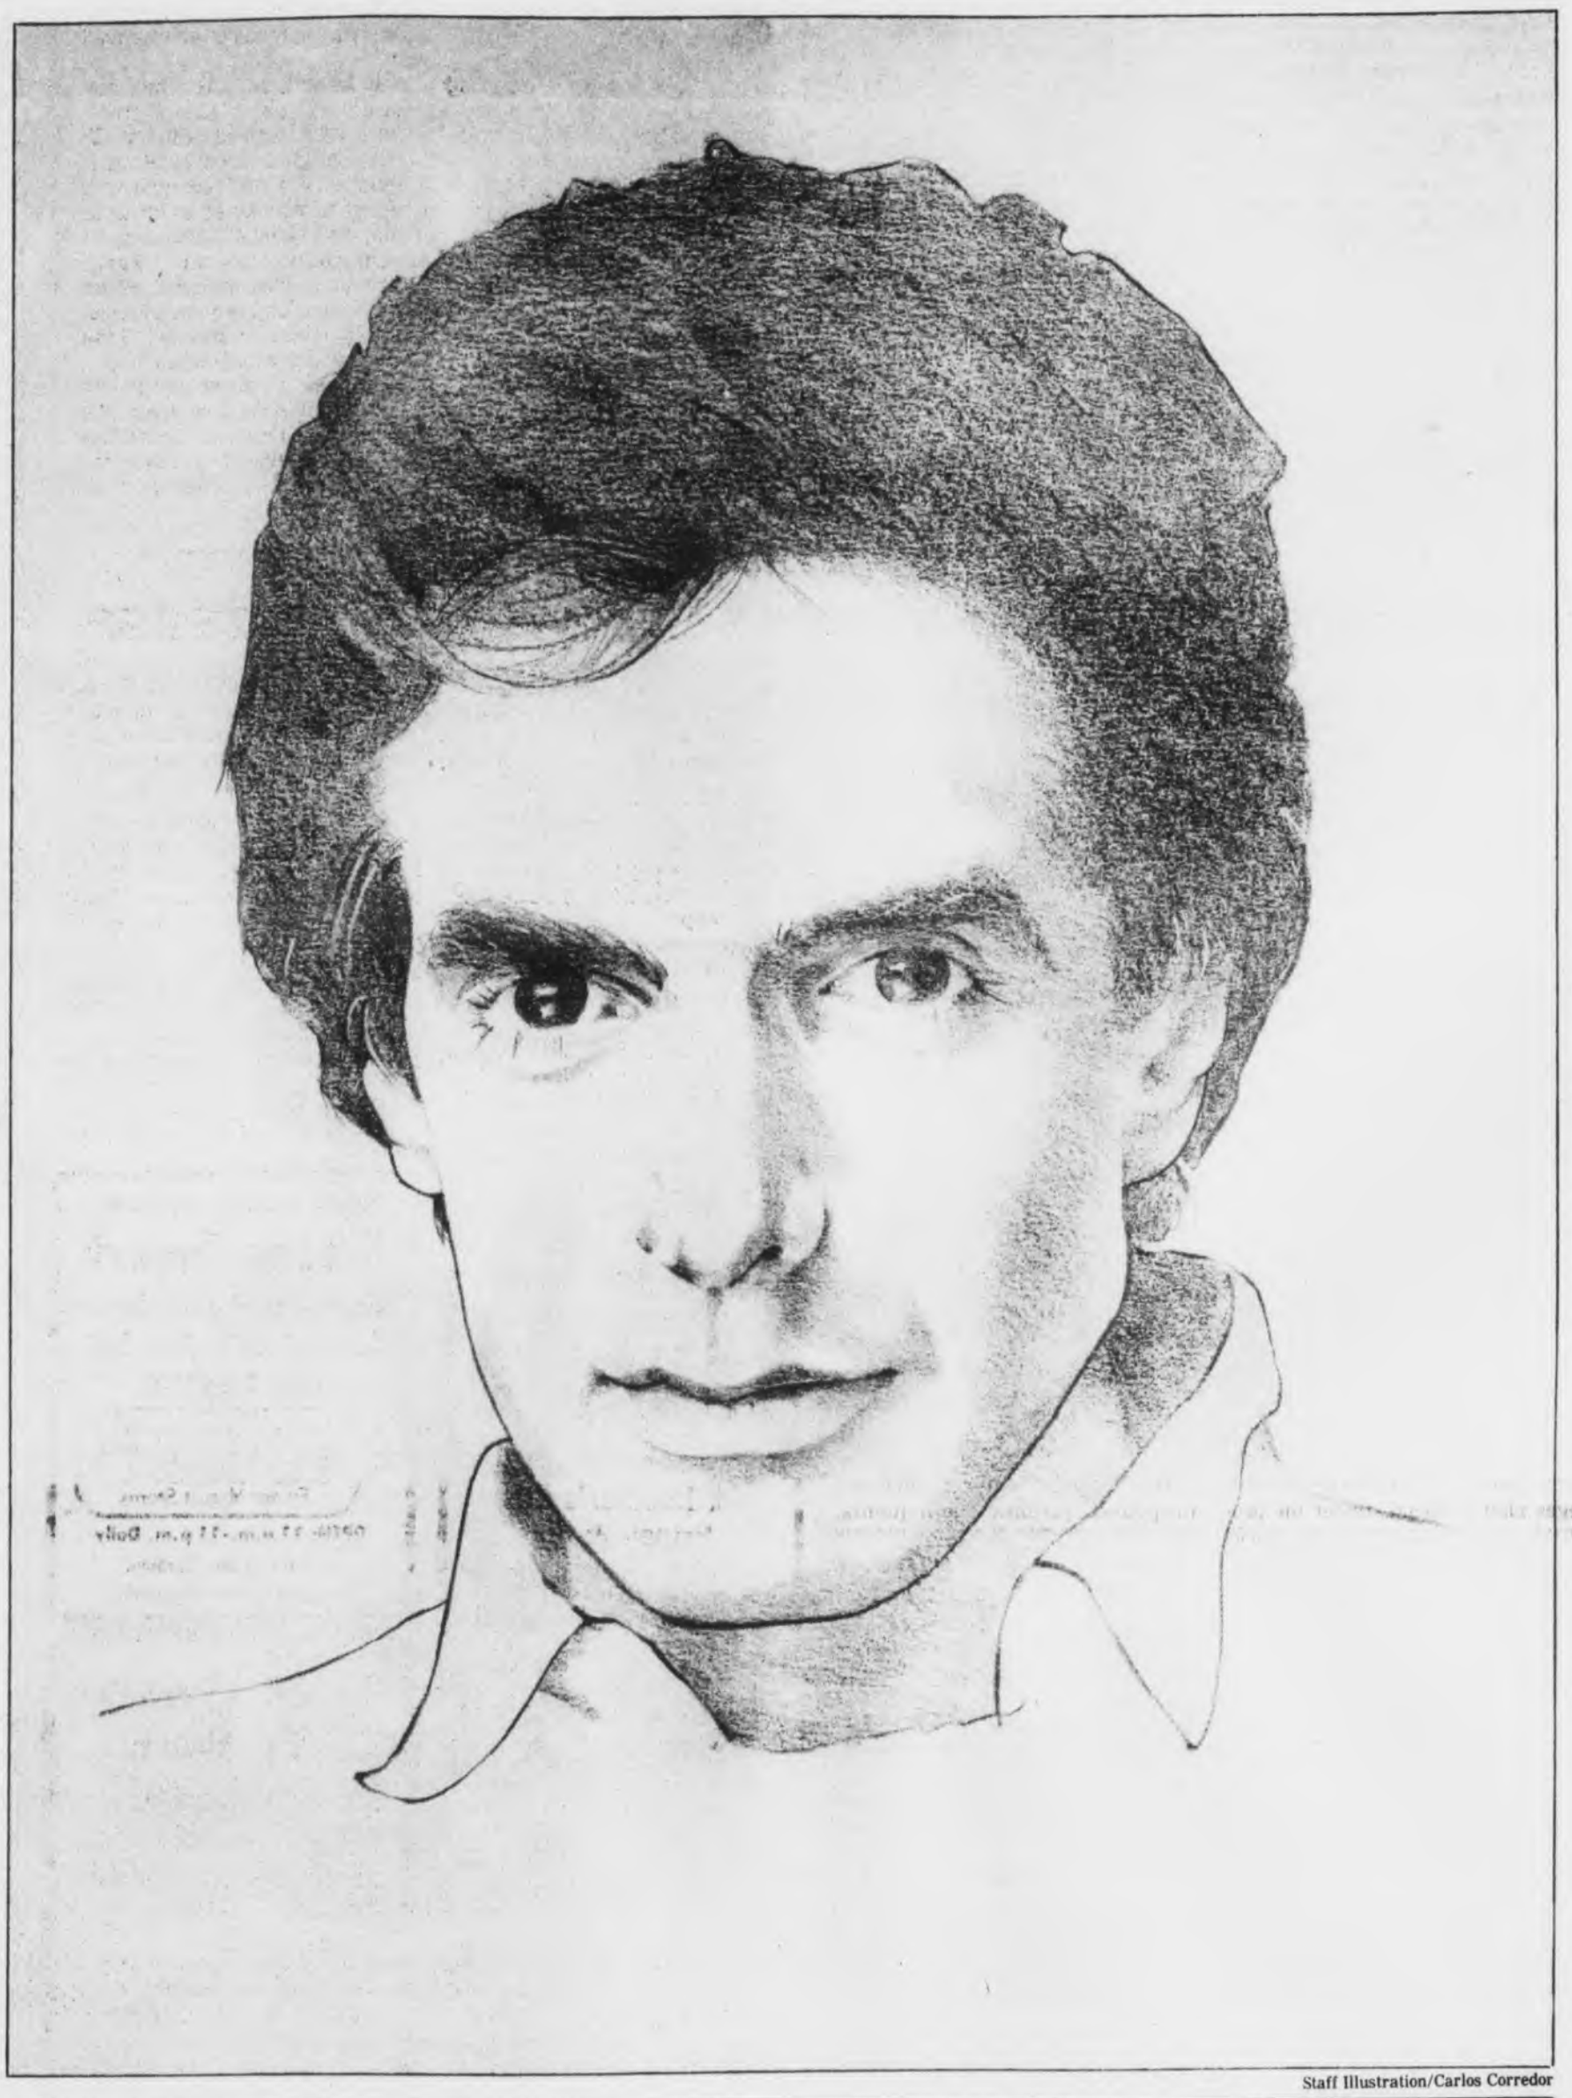
"His new special has an illusion called 'Escape from Alcatraz.' It was filmed on Alcatraz Island, and has David going through a maze of guards, guard dogs, barbed wire, straitjackets and other obstacles to make his escape from the island," Fisher said.

Fisher said a smaller, modified version of 'Escape from Alcatraz' will be a part of Copperfield's performance Saturday at McCain.

"He tries to do every live show a little bit different," Fisher said of Copperfield's tour performances. "He has about 30 different illusions that he chooses from. The stage crew will look at the particular stage that the performance will take place on and then it is decided what illusions will be used."

In addition to touring and doing his television performances, Copperfield uses his mastery of magic to help the handicapped.

It all began when Copperfield received a letter and a picture from a young magician with whom he had been corresponding.



"The picture showed him in a wheelchair," Copperfield said, "But he never mentioned that. He just advertised himself as a magician. It dawned on me that his self-image was so terrific because he had a skill — magic — that made him feel special."

After that, Copperfield worked to establish "Project Magic," a form of rehabilitative therapy that uses the teaching of magic instead of traditional therapy techniques to help patients overcome their handicaps. Project Magic has been used at 500 hospitals in 30 countries around the world. Disabled people find new skills through attempting magic tricks and can advance to performing everyday tasks they couldn't before, such as tying their shoes.

Copperfield's unique dramatic performing style has added a new dimension to magic — emotion.

"For many years, magicians got up on stage and just did tricks, and that's fine because it brings out an emotion in people that no other art form can — amazement. But it bothered me that when I was starting magic, it was a sideshow in a circus or a secondary nightclub act," Copperfield said.

"What I do is not unlike what Steven Spielberg does with film. I do it on stage or television. I think it's taking the audience to a different place. To put it another way, I try to do the same thing with magic that a songwriter does with a song. They share something of themselves through their art form."

Former K-State President Duane Acker has found a "totally new scene" since leaving K-State and accepting a position with the Agency for International Development in Washington, D.C.

Former University president takes '180-degree turn' to aid industrial development office

By DAVID WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

Since handing over the reins of the University and the keys to the president's house, former University President Duane Acker and his wife, have found work and residence in Washington, D.C.

"We have discovered a totally new scene," Acker said in a telephone interview. "It's as if someone has pulled a very large curtain and I find myself taking a 180-degree turn, being exposed to a totally new vista."

The new "scene" Acker refers to is the Agency for International Development in Washington, D.C., where he is Director of Food and Agriculture.

The agency, a branch of the State Department, establishes and develops missions in underdeveloped countries. The purpose of these missions deals with defining and working on ways to solve agriculture and nutritional problems, which vary greatly from country to country.

The role Acker plays at AID is broad, he said. Basically, monitoring the progress of many of the foreign missions and checking to see that United States' money is being well spent, is the greater of his responsibilities, he said.

"It is equally as fascinating and rewarding as being a university president, with a constantly broadening responsibility," he said.

With this new position, Acker will be traveling worldwide to such places as Mexico, Peru, Cyprus, Egypt, Kenya, Latin America and Ethiopia. On these trips, he said he hopes to be accompanied by his wife.

"We both very much enjoy travel, and this is the perfect opportunity for us to do so. It is all working out very well."

When Acker's workday is over, he faces a daily commute to his suburban home in Vienna, Va. A far cry from a quick stroll down the sidewalk east of Anderson Hall to the University president's house, he travels an hour on the Metro (a rail mass-transit system) to the Metro station nearest his home, a one-mile walk.

Even though the pace of life on the East Coast is considerably faster than that of the Midwest, Acker said he and his wife are adjusting well. Part of this is due to both having ancestral roots in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. With this, they have taken up a part-time hobby of conducting a genealogical search for relatives, he said, with much success.

"We have both met relatives we have never known before," Acker said. "We even have tracked down a farm in west-central Pennsylvania which has been run by an Acker since 1888."

When not traveling with her husband or researching her family background, the former first lady of K-State has volunteered time working for another first lady, of the United States that is. Through a friend, Shirley Acker has been given the opportunity to work at the White House helping handle the constant siege of mail to the Reagans, a job she said she very much enjoys.

Though the new life of the Acker's is treating them very well, they still continue to stay in touch with what is happening at K-State, Acker said. He has been active with Kansas' congressional delegation in Washington on topics of concern to the University. He and Shirley also attend Kansas State Alumni meetings, he said.

Moberly trio performing at K-State

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Some K-State basketball fans may not have heard of Moberly, Mo., before, but Moberly is partially responsible for any success the 'Cats hope to achieve this season for three distinct reasons — namely Charles Bledsoe, Mitch Richmond and Dana Altman.

Newcomers Bledsoe and Richmond spent the last two years leading Moberly Junior College to a 69-9 record and third- and sixth-place finishes in the National Junior College Athletic Association championships during that time.

The two blossomed there under the guidance of head coach Altman, who is now an assistant under K-State's Lon Kruger.

All three garnered numerous accolades during that time. Richmond was named as a First-Team NJCAA All-American last season, while Bledsoe was an honorable-mention choice. Altman, meanwhile, was tabbed Region 16 Coach of the Year the past two seasons.

Bledsoe and Richmond are expected to have an immediate impact on the team, and were recently named by Kruger as two of his top six players at this juncture in the year.

"When you watch them as I did recruiting them," Kruger said, "you gain an appreciation for them. Both are probably better players than I had maybe anticipated in a lot of ways."

Altman said he expects both players to make a quick transition from the junior-college ranks to Big Eight Conference basketball.

"We've had players go from our program at Moberly who have had no problem making the adjustment to the Division I level," he said, citing Bernard Day of Nebraska and former Missouri star Jeff Strong as examples.

"Charles and Mitch are...good athletes," Altman said. "And I think (they) will make the adjustments as easy, or possibly even better, than the rest of the players that have gone on and had success."

Richmond, a 6-foot-5, 225-pound guard, is expected to add scoring punch to the Wildcats' offense.

"Mitch is a pretty good scorer," Altman said of the Fort Lauderdale, Fla., native. "(He) can shoot the ball from outside, or, if there's some type of mismatch, can go inside and work inside. He's a pretty versatile athlete, and I think that is important to us."

Bledsoe, who hails from St. Louis, is a 6-foot-7, 220-pound forward. He led Moberly in rebounding last year while pouring in nearly 14 points a game.

"Charles is probably a little better inside, but also can move to 15-16 feet away from the bucket and add versatility," Altman said. "I think he'll be helpful. Charlie has the potential to be an awfully good rebounder, and that's something that's really going to be important to us this season."

All three have entered a new situation at the same time, and the bond established during the past two years has helped ease the transition for each.

"They're the only two people other than my wife that I've known here in Manhattan, so naturally...there's a closeness there," Altman said. "We've been through a lot together the last two years. We played 78 games the last two years, and spent a lot of time in study hall and the weight room and things like that...So right now, they're pretty important to me."

Both players credited Altman with improving their games measurably.

"Coach Altman recruited me out of high school," Bledsoe said. "When I came to Moberly, he's the one who gave me all the confidence in my ability to rebound and score, and play the game of basketball."

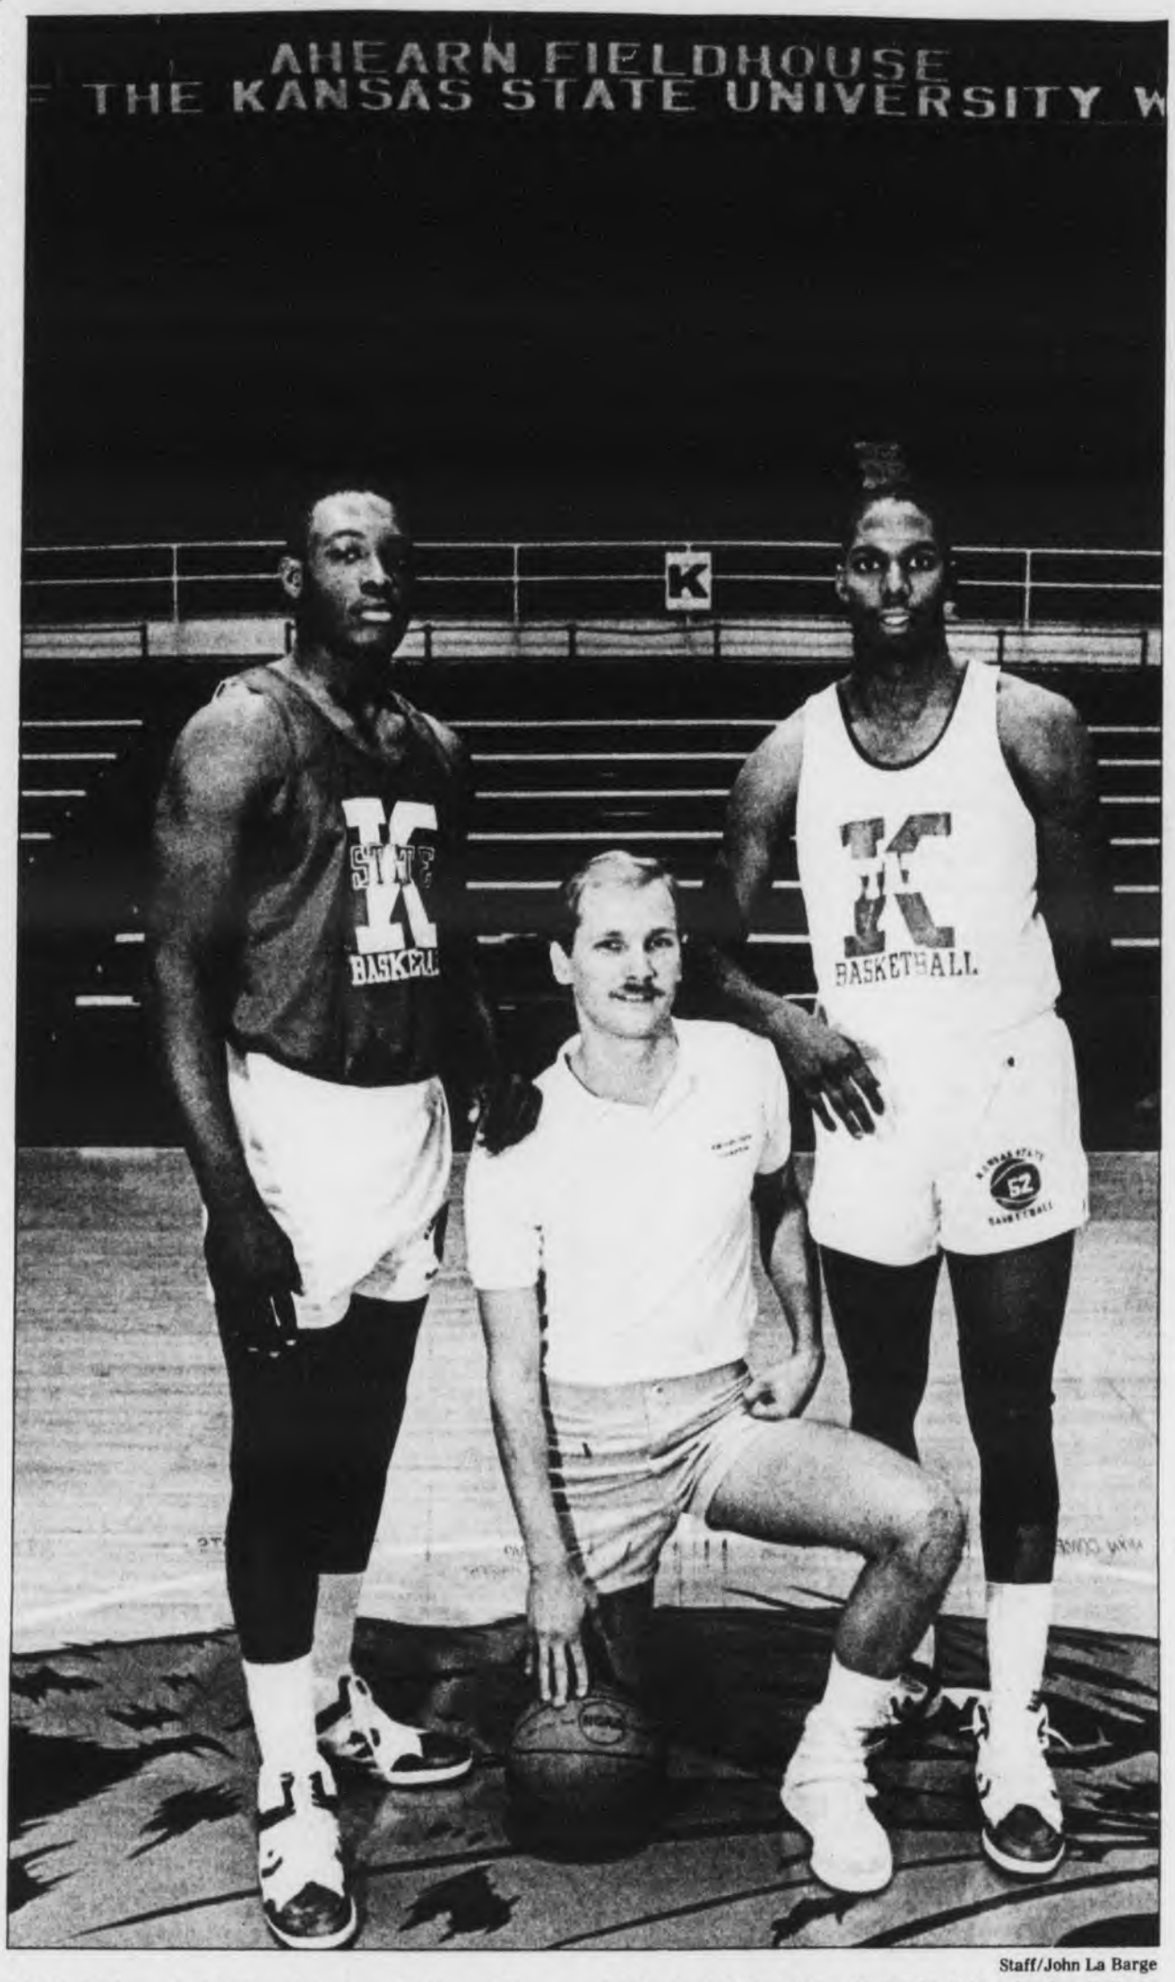
"I can remember when I went to Moberly," Richmond said, "I really couldn't play that much defense, and he helped me to move my feet and get prepared to play defense and get down on each player. He made me play hard."

Then, after a pause, Richmond added, "He makes me play hard."

Bledsoe and Richmond also expressed a mutual respect for one another.

"Mitch and I are very close," Bledsoe said. "Our freshman year, I really didn't know him, but as we started playing together, we became the best of friends."

"He's a nice friend," Richmond said. "We're rooming together, and when we're not on the basketball court, Charles and me will mostly be together riding around Aggieville or just hanging out and talking."



The two also had high praise for their new teammates and head coach.

"Lonnie's a great coach. He works us very hard, and he's never satisfied. We have to always play hard every day in practice," Bledsoe said.

"Everybody on the team gets along real well on and off the court," he added. "It's good to have teammates like that because that will carry on throughout the season."

Altman, who said he has seen both players mature tremendously in the past two years, said he has been impressed at the development of each, both as players and as people.

"It may sound that when I talk about these two guys that I'm a broken record maybe, but I really do think they're both fine young men, and I think they'll both have a fine career here at K-State."

Boston ace earns AL's Cy Young

By The Associated Press

KATY, Texas — Roger Clemens, the Boston Red Sox' right-hander who came back from shoulder surgery to lead the major leagues with 24 victories, became only the third unanimous winner of the American League Cy Young Award on Wednesday.

"These honors are great, but in a heartbeat I would trade them all to be wearing that World Championship ring," said Clemens, whose Red Sox were beaten by the New York Mets after coming within one strike of winning the World Series.

Clemens, at his home in Katy, about 30 miles from Houston, said he hopes he or his teammate Jim Rice will win the league's Most Valuable Player Award, which will be announced next week.

Aware that pitchers usually do not win that honor, he said, "A lot of the oldtimers have told me that I have changed their minds about that."

The voting, as with all the Baseball Writers Association Awards, was completed before the postseason games.

Clemens joined Detroit's Denny McLain and New York's Ron Guidry as the AL's only unanimous Cy Young winners since the baseball writers began giving the award to the best pitcher in each league in 1967.

ISU sacks grid coach

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — Embattled Iowa State football coach Jim Criner was fired Wednesday night by university president Gordon Eaton.

"As a result of the recently completed university investigation of NCAA allegations pertaining to football, new leadership is desired for Iowa State University's football program," Eaton said in a statement.

Chuck Banker, an assistant, was named acting football coach for the rest of the regular season, which includes games this Saturday against K-State and the following week against Oklahoma State.

ISU Sports Information Director Dave Starr said a news conference is scheduled for 11 a.m. Thursday.

In the statement, Eaton said Iowa State "intends to run a clean athletic program that is above suspicion and will comply with the spirit and intent of NCAA regulations.

"The university will not tolerate violations of university or NCAA rules and intends to see that future violations do not occur," he said.

Criner will be paid salary and benefits through Feb. 28, 1988.

Buffalo, Sooner supporters preparing for Wishbone Five-0

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Not to anyone's surprise, Oklahoma notched at least one Big Eight Conference record in its 77-0 stomping of Missouri Saturday with 10 rushing touchdowns. And Sooner place-kicker Tim Lashar established two marks of his own.

Lashar — the Big Eight's career leader with 162 successful PATs — notched 11 extra-point kicks for one record and he extended his consecutive PAT streak to 129 for another league mark. Lashar is in a battle with Alabama's Van Tiffen for the NCAA consecutive PAT record — Tiffen has kicked 130 straight PATs.

A new pilot for a television series? It's Wishbone Five-0 when Oklahoma (8-1, 5-0) travels to Boulder, Colo., for a game with the Buffaloes (5-4, 5-0) which could easily determine the Big Eight's representative to the Orange Bowl.

OU-Colorado is the Big Eight/Raycom game-of-the-week with kickoff slated for 12:38 CST. Missouri (2-7, 1-4) at Oklahoma State (4-5, 2-3) has been moved to Dec. 4 for an ESPN telecast.

Other conference matchups include K-State (2-7, 1-4) at Iowa State (5-4, 2-3) and Nebraska (8-1, 4-1) at Kansas (3-6, 0-5).

Statistics and quotes from around the Big Eight include the following.

Nebraska downed Iowa State 35-14 Saturday, but the 'Huskers trailed 14-7 at the half. According to NU defensive coordinator Charlie McBride, the 'Huskers didn't play well defensively in the first half.

"We looked like a bunch of guys left over from Custer's Last Stand," he said.

Iowa State quarterback Alex Espinosa now has 4,820 career passing yards and needs 156 more to move ahead of former Nebraska great David Humm (1972-74) who is sixth on the Big Eight list.

Bob Valesente, Kansas' coach, on facing the 'Huskers this week: "Us against Nebraska is like me stepping into the ring against Marvin Hagler. We just hope to go the distance and avoid the knockout punch."

Freshman quarterback Mike Gundy of Oklahoma State has completed 81-of-161 passes this season (.503) with just one interception and is on line to set a conference mark for interception avoidance.

OU's Claude Arnold had only one pass picked off in 114 attempts (.093) during the 1950 season (minimum 100 attempts category), and in 1971, Jerry Tagge of Nebraska threw four interceptions in 239 tries for a 1.67 percentage (minimum 200 attempts).

Turner Gill, also an ex-Husker, had a 2.57 percentage in his career from 1980-83. He leads the minimum 300 attempts slot with only 11 interceptions in 428 tries.

Cat coach announces women's scrimmages

By The Collegian Staff

K-State women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman recently announced the scheduling of two intrasquad scrimmages before the regular season gets underway Nov. 28.

A "Purple and White" scrimmage is slated for 10 a.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House, and the Lady Cats will play at Newton High School Nov. 18. Admission is free for Saturday's scrimmage, while a dollar will be charged for admission to the Newton contest.

"We're excited to go up and down the court in front of an audience with officials and a real game-type situation," Mossman said. "Both the coaches and players are anxious to get out there and get into the flow of things."

Mossman said the scrimmages will provide her with an opportunity to determine her starting lineup and to see how the six freshman players will react in a game situation.

"Both of these scrimmages will be used primarily to help us decide who our five starters will be on opening night," Mossman said. "We will be looking to see which of our players will perform best in a game-type situation.

"We'll especially be looking to see how our younger players will handle the game-type scrimmage. After all, this will be our first chance, along with everyone else, to see them in action," she added.

K-State's women get the regular season underway with the annual opening Lady Cat Basketball Classic. This year's tourney, sponsored by McCall Pattern Co. of Manhattan, begins Nov. 28 with Texas-Arlington meeting Loyola Marymount (Calif.) at 6 p.m.

K-State plays Western Illinois at 8 p.m.

Wildcats fall to sixth in Big Eight play

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's volleyball team concluded its conference- and regular-season schedules by dropping a three-game match Wednesday to the University of Missouri at Columbia.

The Tigers reeled off victories of 15-12, 15-13, 15-13 to up their record to 3-5 in Big Eight Conference play and 8-17 overall. The Wildcats, who ended a four-game road trip, fell to 2-8 in the conference and 12-16 on the season.

"It was a close match because there were a number of short runs of three or four points in every game by both teams," K-State coach Scott Nelson said. "However, it came down to who made those runs at the end of the games, and unfortunately Missouri did."

K-State was hampered with its second-lowest hitting efficiency of the season in a match that lasted three games.

"We didn't get tough when we needed to and Missouri was tough when it counted," Nelson said. "We struggled less with unforced errors, but we had too many to win this match."

One bright spot for the Wildcats was the play of Mary Mignano. Nelson said in the third game, Mignano ran the 5-1 offense — which the 'Cats hadn't used since last season — and the 'Cats sophomore setter collected seven assists.

"Mary played really well and her sets allowed the hitters to get ready when they were attacking," Nelson said.

The game was also the last regular-season outing for seniors Helen Bundy and Cindy Durham.

With the loss, K-State dropped to sixth place in the conference race, and will face the No. 3 seed in the Big Eight tourney Nov. 21 at Penn Valley Community College in Kansas City.

The Wildcats will either face Kansas or Iowa State in the opening round of the tourney, depending on the outcome of other conference action later this week.

Mets make traditional visit to nation's capital

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan toasted baseball's finest Wednesday, welcoming a delegation of the World Series champion New York Mets to the White House and proclaiming them the pride of America.

"You have certainly done yourselves, the city of New York and all America proud," Reagan said in congratulating the handful of players, including pitchers Dwight Gooden and Bob Ojeda and catcher Gary Carter, who joined him at the Rose Garden ceremony.

Mets Manager Davey Johnson, who had been on an exhibition tour of Japan, was not on hand, nor were such key members of the team as first baseman Keith Hernandez, outfielders Darryl Strawberry and Mookie Wilson and pitcher Ron Darling.

Reagan recalled the 1962 Mets, a hapless bunch that posted an embarrassing 40-120 record and prompted Casey Stengel to question, "Can't anybody here play this game?"

"Well, not only did the Mets show America that the 'Other Team from New York' could play this game, they did it their way — the Mets made 'em say, 'Ya Gotta Believe,' " the president, a self-described Chicago Cubs fan, told the audience of players' wives and members of the New York congressional delegation.

Reagan brought back the image of Game 6 of the World Series. Trailing the Boston Red Sox 5-3 in the 10th inning, and one strike away from elimination, the Mets rallied to win 6-5. Two days later, they again came from behind to win Game 7 and take the Series, four games to three.

"... You came back to epitomize what that other bard of baseball, Yogi Berra, once said — 'The game isn't over 'til it's over,'" the president said.

Carter presented Reagan with an orange-and-blue Mets warm-up jacket, with the name Reagan emblazoned on the back.

Class system still fascinates British

By The Associated Press

LONDON — An interviewer for the British Broadcasting Corp. asked novelist Barbara Cartland a few years ago if Britain's class barriers were coming down.

"Of course they have," retorted the high-society author of hundreds of best-selling romantic tales, "or I wouldn't be sitting here talking to someone like you."

The barriers may be coming down, but they are still a source of endless fascination, as a glance at this week's newspapers and TV listings quickly proves.

The Daily Telegraph just ran a two-part survey on what it calls "The Great British Obsession," and The Times had a column asking whether class-mindedness equals elitism.

Over on the Independent Television network, viewers are into the ninth part of "Paradise Postponed," John Mortimer's panoramic drama about the changes Britain has undergone as its class system has crumbled.

Once reviled as the bane of British society, class consciousness was supposed to have suffered a savage blow on the battlefields of World War I and the coup de grace in World War II.

But the remnants continue to provide rich pickings, as shown by the Telegraph series, which included everything from interviews with lords, ladies and hotel doormen to a quiz for readers to test their "class awareness."

"It is all very puzzling to Americans," wrote reporter Martyn Harris. "To most foreigners, we are still what George Orwell called 'the most class-ridden nation under the sun.'"

However, interesting twists to the story emerge. In the interviews, it was the aristocrats who were most eager to distance themselves from the class system. Blue-collar interviewees sounded quite comfortable with it.

The quiz asked readers to associate shops, garments, celebrities and professions with a particular class. But the main goal was to get as many answers wrong as possible, to prove oneself "qualified for the egalitarian world."

This eagerness to appear "classless" falls in with a general awareness today that the true upheaval in Britain's class system is being generated not by working-class revolutionaries, but from the very force once thought to be the bastion of class-consciousness — the Conservative Party.

For those who still judge a person's character by whether he wears four buttons or two on his jacket cuff, the problem is that today's Tories are led not by a country squire but by Margaret Thatcher, a self-made grocer's daughter professing nothing but contempt for inherited privilege.

This is the essence of the storyline of "Paradise Postponed" and the basis of Harris' main conclusion: "An obsession with the class system is a sign of how uncertain people are becoming of their place within it."

As Britain becomes increasingly less industrial and shifts to finance, high-tech manufacturing and entertainment, an education at Eton becomes less essential for success.

Moslem captors may raise price for remainder of French hostages

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Joy over the release of two French hostages held in Lebanon was tempered Wednesday by speculation that the kidnappers, Iran or Syria may raise the price of freedom for those who remain.

The return home Tuesday of Camille Sontag, 85, and Marcel Coudari, 54, brought to five the number of French captives Shiite Moslem fundamentalists have freed this year.

At least five still are held. Coudari corroborated previous reports that a sixth French kidnap victim may be dead.

In each release, the hostages passed through Damascus, capital of Syria. Premier Jacques Chirac has called Syria "the obligatory passageway to any solution to the Lebanese crisis."

Iran is an equally important factor, commentators said Wednesday.

"Chirac Fulfilled the Conditions Set out by the Damascus-Tehran Axis," was the headline in Le Matin, a Socialist-leaning daily.

Le Matin compared the freeing of hostages to a banking transaction in which two signatures are necessary: Syria and Iran.

The pro-government daily Le Figaro commented: "It is clear that, to obtain freedom for the other hostages, one must again pay the pound of flesh. At what level? We do not know. Blackmail? No doubt."

Chirac's government denies negotiating to free the Frenchmen and insists that its Middle East policy is not being determined by the hostage situation.

Iran and Syria praised France's Middle East policy after the kidnappers released Sontag and Coudari.

France is normalizing relations with Iran. It recently agreed to pay $330 million to settle a dispute over a $1 billion loan made to France by the late Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, who was ousted in 1979 by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's fundamentalist Shiite revolution.

Sontag and Coudari were freed in Beirut on Monday, the day European Common Market foreign ministers met in London to take measures against Syria for its alleged support of terrorism.

Those adopted included an embargo on arms sales to Syria, which gets nearly all its weapons from the Soviet Union.

France would not accept stronger sanctions. Those originally proposed by Britain, which broke relation with Syria last month, were diluted.

state treasury," Chambers said.

"We have to move fast if we are to establish a racing presence in Kansas. We believe it is absolutely essential that every effort be made to expedite licensing of tracks and allocations of racing days."

The key to the plan is approval of 100 racing days, about three days a week from March to November, by the envisioned five-member state racing commission.

The sparks started with remarks by Keith Dillon, Olathe, a member of the governor's task force on pari-mutuel who is affiliated with the greyhound racing business. He angered quarterhorse representatives when he said it wasn't feasible to build dual race tracks to handle both dog and horse racing.

"I've never know a dual track to be successful," Dillon told the committee. "There are no dual tracks in operation in this country that I know of. There were a couple, but they either went broke or converted completely to greyhound racing."

Al Becker, Kansas City, also a task force member and a representative of the quarterhorse industry, immediately followed Dillon to the witness stand to take issue with Dillon's statements and defend the horse racing industry.

The debate was significant because horse and dog racers will be competing for racing days and for betting dollars once the Legislature lays down groundrules for gambling and tracks are established.

Greyhound racers want independent tracks devoted solely to dogs while horse owners would prefer dual tracks.

Horse racers are threatened by the dog industry because the overhead associated with horses — such as the stables, training, jockeys — is much greater than for dogs and their tracks, which are shorter than horse tracks.

"We wouldn't even be here right now if it wasn't for the quarterhorse association," Becker said. "The quarterhorse associations took the initiative in getting this passed and shouldn't be left out of this thing.

The confrontation indicated the groups have not resolved the split which was evident during task force deliberations on the issue.

Reilly and Miller told lawmakers on the panel not to get impatient with the legislative process as the implementation legislation proceeds.

Reilly said he was aware of the "overwhelming support" the gambling amendments received in the Nov. 4 general election when Kansas voters decided to rewrite the state constitution to allow a gambling on a state-run lottery and pari-mutuel wagering.

"The people expect us to move with dispatch but we must be cautious as we proceed," Reilly said at the start of the hearings. "We must be very careful not to make mistakes."

Miller said there's too much riding on the legislation to push it quickly through the 1987 Legislature.

"There will be a great deal of money spent on this," Miller said. "I would caution the committee to really pay attention to this legislation. People will be spending millions of dollars and we don't want to get in a big hurry and make a mistake."

They were reacting to Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, who tried to elicit promises from both men to expedite the proposals and ensure bills implementing pari-mutuel gambling will reach the desk of Gov.-Elect Mike Hayden no later than Feb. 15 to be signed into law or vetoed.

"I think we should set a goal of Feb. 15 to get these on the governor's desk," Vidricksen said. "I've got people at home who are waiting on this. I don't want to miss the summer racing season. I think we should put pari-mutuel on the front burner and get on with it."

The committee is considering a proposal by the governor's task force which calls for a five-member racing commission which would have wide powers to license track owners and operators and police the racing industry.

Only non-profit organizations would be allowed to apply for racing licenses and license fees would be $5,000, with an additional $200 fee for each day of racing.

The state would impose a 10 percent gate tax on admissions charged at race tracks. Under a straight bet — win, place or show — on horse races, the state would collect a 3 percent tax on the total wagered each day. For straight dog racing, the tax would be 5 percent. The state tax would be slightly higher for exotic bets.

The betting public would take its winnings from 72 percent of the total wagered each day. From the 18 percent takeout, track owners and managers would take 9 percent, the state would collect 3-5 percent depending on horse or dog racing, and the purse paid horse owners would amount to 6 percent while dog owners would collect 4 percent.

Ferry

officials in Anse-a-Galets usually check the ferry's load before it is allowed to leave the port but no such examination is made when the vessel leaves Montrouis, a stretch of rocky beach about 60 miles north of Haiti's capital, Port-au-Prince.

In Montrouis, the ferry anchors a few feet offshore and passengers are carried aboard by people who charge 10 cents for the service.

"If there was a port, a police station (in Montrouis), the ship captains would not put so many people on their boat. They just want to make more money," said Ania St. Fleur, 22, another relative.

The relatives said they had been waiting in Montrouis since early Wednesday and not heard from any government officials.

The military-civilian government that replaced ousted dictator Jean-Claude Duvalier eight months ago has not issued a statement on the incident.

Overcrowding at Brother's Tavern, however, has not been the only problem in Aggieville bars.

Smith said there have been safety problems other than overcrowding.

In the past, some beer garden exit doors have been locked by the bar owners to keep people from sneaking in through the backdoor, he said.

In addition to locked exit doors, some exits have been blocked and aisles have been overcrowded, situations also in violation of safety codes, Smith said.

"There is a major concern for public safety," he said.

Ben Pease, senior in pre-medicine, said he is not surprised that Brother's was fined for overcrowding.

"I have been there at times when it was wall-to-wall packed with people; you could hardly breathe," he said.

"If Brother's started on fire (when it was overcrowded), there is no way most people would get out," he said. "Only people by the door and in the beer garden would be able to get out."

Loss

looked, for instance, at Alabama, but they weren't interested," she said.

Despite all the effort, the results were disappointing: The committee sold 3,058 tickets at $12.50 a piece, for a total ticket income of $38,225. In addition, the committee earned $900 in T-shirt sale commission, for a total income of $39,125.

The committee paid $25,000 for the group, $9,000 in production costs, $1,000 for the supporting act (Alkatraz), $6,000 for rental of Ahearn, $3,638 for advertising, $1,300 for catering (breakfast and two hot meals to the band and its crew — 40 people in all), and $6,281 in other expenses (chair rentals, booking and advising, security, etc.). This brought total expenditures to $52,219. Hence, a loss of $13,394.

In hindsight, Stephens said, booking Starship was a bad decision, but this is not the first time they've lost money on a concert. In 1983, she said, the total loss was approximately $42,000. Performers that year were the Stray Cats, Ronnie Milsap and Joan Jett and the Blackhearts.

Due to a trend toward poor turnout, however, the Union, which must cover the loss, has opted to discontinue concerts, Altland said. She said promoter shows now will be the only hope for future concerts at K-State. A promoter show is one from which the Union makes little or no profit, but is guaranteed protection against any loss.

An example of this, Stephens said, is when Chicago came to K-State. They, in effect, served as their own promoter, agreeing to cover any loss which UPC might incur on the condition that they would receive a large percentage of the profits. K-State receives perhaps as little as 10 percent of the profits from promoter shows, Stephens said.

However, even these groups will be an unlikely prospect in K-State's future, Stephens said. "Our track record for concerts has not been too great," she said. "Basically, we would be a last chance effort for them if they needed something in the area. They're not going to be knocking down our door."

As for the future of the Special Events Committee, Stephens said she sees as a possibility restructuring the committee and perhaps combining it with another committee, such as Eclectic Entertainment.

"We will do smaller shows, but I really don't see us doing another concert, she said. Altland said the $18,000 which the Union gives UPC really is not much with which to work.

"Most universities get a lot more," she said. "$100,000 is not unreasonable for some universities, she said.

In addition, Altland said, the responsibility of subsidizing other committees that Special Events has recently undertaken was once the job of the Films Committee. Due to videos, cable and the like, however, Films Committee is now unable to produce sufficient funds, Altland said.

Bill advises Aggieville shutdown

By DARLA RYAN
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate heard first reading Thursday night on a bill proposing that Senate recommend to the Aggieville Merchants Association and city of Manhattan that Aggieville be closed next year on the day of the K-State-University of Kansas football game.

The bill's sponsors, Sally Traeger, Senate chairwoman and senior in marketing, and Steven Johnson, student body president and junior in agricultural economics, suggested Aggieville be blocked off by road blocks and police.

"We would like to have both the Riley County Police Department and the military police from Fort Riley at the road blocks to prevent entrance," Traeger said.

"We have to take a strong stand on this," she said. "And we've got to do it this year."

Traeger and Johnson said they believe the core of the problem is the large crowd that congregates in Aggieville. By closing Aggieville, the bill's sponsors said they believe the crowd will break up into groups and go elsewhere.

"I don't think it's probable that 5,000 people are going to all try to go to the same place," Traeger said.

Traeger and Johnson are proposing that the Aggieville business district be shut down for the entire day, not just the night.

She said that although this could have a bad economic impact for stores usually receiving a lot of business that day, the benefits of closing outweigh losing one day of business.

"When we say Aggieville, we mean that whole strip (Moro Street) plus the surrounding bars," Johnson said.

The sponsors said they believe the publicity received by closing Aggieville would in itself lower the number of people coming to Manhattan on that day.

"We wouldn't have as many people from other universities and surrounding towns coming to Manhattan just for the 'riot,'" Traeger said.

If the bill is approved by Senate next week, the sponsors will present the recommendation to the Aggieville Merchants Association. The association already has discussed similar action but have not yet made any decisions.

In the event that the bill is rejected by the association, Johnson said he would like to present a list of several

Reagan denies making trade with terrorists

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan confirmed Thursday night he undertook 18 months of secret diplomacy with Iran and said he sent it "small amounts" of weapons to improve relations, not to ransom American hostages in Lebanon.

He said it was not his intention to tilt U.S. policy toward Iran in its bloody six-year war with Iraq.

"Due to the publicity of the past week, the entire initiative is very much at risk today," the president told the nation in an address broadcast from the Oval Office.

Saying he was being forced to speak out by widespread rumors about his dealings with Iran, Reagan acknowledged he sent former national security adviser Robert C. McFarlane on a four-day mission to Tehran last spring "to raise the diplomatic level of contacts" with moderates in Iran.

"Since then," Reagan said in his hastily arranged address, "the dialogue has continued, and step-by-step progress continues to be made."

The president spoke in the midst of clamor from Capitol Hill, and demands from many of his conservative political allies, for a detailed defense of the administration's heretofore secret arms dealings with Iran.

After Reagan spoke, Senate Democratic leader Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia called the president's Iranian initiative "a major foreign relations blunder" and questioned its impact "on our own credibility with our friends and within our own country."

Said Rajaie-Khorassani, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, of Reagan's speech: "To me it was a very optimistic statement and to some extent a constructive statement."

He said Iran has "made certain conditions" for a continuation of the diplomatic efforts, and said that if these conditions are met, a "mutual understanding will develop."

McFarlane, interviewed Thursday night on NBC-TV, was asked whether Third convocation to feature satirical writer, cartoonist

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Jules Feiffer is first a writer, then a cartoonist, four professors agreed in a pre-convocation forum Thursday evening in Farrell Library's Browsing Room.

Feiffer, a 1986 Pulitzer Prize-winning cartoonist, will give the third convocation Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

Joe Unekis, associate professor of political science, said his first introduction to Feiffer was through Playboy magazine, which Feiffer wrote for in 1958. He said Feiffer is a "sharp, satirical writer who aims at people who need it."

Cartoons came into the public eye with the invention of the print media. They focused on the common man and gave him an opportunity to express his "loyal opposition" to the government, Unekis said. This was a subtle concept not widely accepted in the rest of the world.

Slides showing how satire in art progressed since the 17th century were presented by John O'Shea, assistant professor of art. Satirical art exists in prints and paintings. O'Shea used Francisco Goya, Charles Gibson, Bill Mauldin and John Held Jr. as examples of satirical artists.

"Feiffer is a writer. They (his cartoons) may be memorable images, but not in the sense of Goya," O'Shea said.

Feiffer had difficulty developing a caricature of former President

Disturbance prompts contributors to recall KSU Foundation pledges

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Problems created by the Aggieville disturbance continue to haunt the University.

Though money continues to flow in for Catherine Robare, whose car was destroyed during the disturbance, future contributions to the KSU Foundation are being withdrawn as a result of the Oct. 18 melee.

To date, more than $2,000 has been raised for Robare — $1,934 from a fund set up by the Rev. Ben Duerfeldt of the First Christian Church, 115 Courthouse Plaza, and about $200 from a fund set up Monday by the Student Governing Association.

Things aren't going as well with the Foundation.

Several contributors to the Foundation have withdrawn their pledges as a result of the Aggieville disturbance, said Foundation Director Art Loub.

Loub said he has received letters from contributors who expressed their unhappiness and blamed the University for the actions that occurred during the disturbance.

"What they've done is withdraw what they consider (to be) their future support," Loub said.

"Those people who were extremely upset with the riot will use this as a way to voice their discontent," he said. "What we've done, by that activity (the disturbance) occurring, is provide an opportunity for those people to exercise negative judgment."

Loub stressed that none of the withdrawals were from major contributors. However, he did say that the withdrawals would "have some effect" on scholarship funding.

"The greater effect might not be financial," he said. "The greater effect is attitudinal."

Loub said the only recourse Foundation had was "to give our explanation of what transpired. Everyone is providing a rationale for what happened."

Loub said pledges were withdrawn after the 1984 Aggieville disturbance, but "to a far lesser degree."

"We had some unhappiness, but I don't recall as much as we have now," he said.

The fact that the disturbance happened a second time made the problem "much more profound," and the withdrawals could have a serious long-range effect if the Aggieville disturbances continue, Loub said.

"It's got to stop," he said. "People have got to get their act together. It doesn't add any luster to the institution to have that kind of action perpetrated within our area, even though a lot of the students were not K-Staters."

The car fund set up in the Union this week by SGA was an attempt to alter some of the bad images attributed to the University after the disturbance.

"We feel the situation with Catherine Robare was a very unfortunate situation," said Sally Traeger, Student Senate chairwoman and senior in marketing.

"We felt like we had a responsibility to her — not as the culprits, because we're not — but because we are a part of the community."

Traeger said that because the SGA is a large portion of the University, the group decided to take the leadership position in forming the fund-raiser.

Before setting up the fund-raiser, Traeger said certain legalities had to be checked.

Athletic fee issue to be resolved next semester, Senate chair says

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

The issue over the proposed athletic fee will probably be resolved next semester, Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger said Thursday.

"I do look for this to be resolved next semester," said Traeger, senior in marketing. "I think it would be dangerous to run the issue between Student Senate terms."

Traeger said she saw the athletic fee as a good issue to come to a referendum vote in February during Senate elections.

"I believe it is a strong enough issue that students should have a right to decide what they'd like to do," she said. "In the end, I think it should be a student vote."

That seems to be the opinion of the Athletic Fee Task Force, as well.

After a survey of the task force members was run in the Oct. 30 Collegian, Traeger attended the Nov. 4 task force meeting to tell members that their charge had been changed.

Instead of presenting Senate with a written proposal, she told them they were to come up with a recommendation.

"I didn't want to mean that they were being punished for stating their opinions," Traeger said. "My view is that we formed the task force because we don't have enough information upon which to base an opinion."

Traeger said she had no problems with task force members forming opinions. What she did expect, however, was that if they were ready to make statements and give opinions, then they should be ready to come to Senate with their recommendations.

"Yes, they do have freedom of speech," she said, "and I don't want to suppress that by any means. But if we look at the philosophy behind forming the task force, then we've defeated the purpose."

Traeger said the original charge of the task force was "very vague."

"It was something new to us," she said. "In interpreting the legislation when we came to a vote on it, we did not anticipate that the charge, as given in the bill, would be as ambiguous in practice as it was in theory."

Traeger said the new charge given the task force was "a more efficient way to go about it."

She said it was not her intention to chastise task force members for stating their opinions.

"They were put in a pretty compromising position," she said. "It's not every day, or even every semester or academic year, that an issue as controversial as the athletic fee comes up."

Traeger said she tried to be as "democratic and diplomatic" as possible in her address to the task force, but that her intentions may have been misconstrued.

Traeger said she knew the athletic fee issue was going to be a tough one.

"What I didn't anticipate was that each of the members of that task force would have such a great

Soviet leader plans trip to India

NEW DELHI, India — India announced Thursday that Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev would pay a four-day visit beginning Nov. 25 and called it a significant event for international peace.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Deb Kumar Maitra announced the dates but refused to give details, saying they were still being worked out.

"Both sides attach great importance to the visit as a significant event in the shared objectives of both our countries and leaders to strengthen international peace and cooperation," Maitra said.

Swiss agree to pay for Rhine spill

BASEL, Switzerland — The regional government accused the Sandoz chemical company of negligence in a toxic spill that has polluted the Rhine River. A Common Market official said Thursday the Swiss agreed to pay compensation to neighboring countries.

About 30 tons of chemicals washed into the Rhine on Nov. 1 when firefighters doused a blaze at a Sandoz warehouse near Basel. A 25-mile-long slick drifted down the 820-mile Rhine to the North Sea, killing an estimated 500,000 fish and eels, harming other aquatic life and endangering drinking water.

"It is inexcusable when the desire for progress and well-being have to be paid for with negligence that has severe consequences," the Basel canton (state) government said Wednesday in statement on the spill. The statement did not elaborate or say what action, if any, the regional government planned.

Vatican praises American bishops

VATICAN CITY — Vatican officials on Thursday praised American bishops for siding with the Vatican in a dispute over a liberal U.S. church leader and said the move could usher in a new era of cooperation.

The bishops, conducting their annual meeting in Washington, said Wednesday the Vatican was within its rights in disciplining Seattle Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen, a liberal.

"The U.S. bishops came out surprisingly strong on the side of the Holy See on the Hunthausen affair," said a Vatican official who, in keeping with Vatican customs, spoke on condition of anonymity. "They (the bishops) were on the right track."

There was a "general sense of relief and satisfaction" in the Vatican over the statement, said another Vatican official who also spoke on condition of anonymity. He called the statement "amicable and satisfactory."

NASA rejects fisherman's claim

WASHINGTON — The National Aeronautics and Space Administration has rejected a Brazilian fisherman's $21 million claim that falling debris from the space shuttle Challenger killed his son and sank his boat.

The lawyer for John Kipalani said he will sue the space agency in federal court.

"You have not provided substantiating evidence of the loss of claimant's boat, loss of his son, or even to injury to the claimant himself," NASA wrote to Kipalani's lawyer, William H. Edwards.

Kipalani, a 52-year-old Indian, claimed he was sailing on a homemade shrimper with his son, Ken, 24, from Colombia to Baltimore on Jan. 28 when a 20-foot-long piece of metal fell from the sky and pierced his boat. His son was sleeping below, he said, and he never saw him again.

He filed a boating accident claim with the Coast Guard a month and a half later, on March 10, putting the time of the incident at 10:30 a.m. and the place 53 miles off the North Carolina coast. The shuttle exploded at 11:38 a.m.

College extends free tuition offer

NORTH NEWTON — Eight members of displaced farm families have taken Bethel College up on its free tuition offer and school officials have decided to extend the program.

Eight students, four men and four women, are attending Bethel in response to the school's offer to waive its $4,750 annual tuition, said Melvin Goering, director of institutional planning and business affairs.

On. Nov. 3, the executive committee of the school's board of directors voted to extend the program through the 1987-88 school year, Goering said.

The officials cited the continuing severity of the farm crisis in taking the action, he said.

"It was the same motivation that originated the program, plus the fact that we have eight students started on the program and the board wants to see them continue. The board also recognizes that there has been no signifcant improvement in the farm crisis," Goering said.

The eight students come from three different states and are enrolled in various courses of study including education, business administration, and international development, Goering said.

Renewal of the program will be considered on an annual basis, Goering said.

To qualify, prospective students must be 25 years old or older. They must have been displaced from agriculture during the past two years for financial reasons. The potential students also must make normal application and file for whatever grants in aid they normally might receive excluding loans.

Man sets fire to children, kills self

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — An 8-year-old girl died of burns when a relative accused of sexually abusing her set fire to her and her brother after breaking into their home, shooting their father and then killing himself, police said.

Police Lt. Ron Miller said the man, Michael A. Moore, 32, was found dead of a self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head when police entered the smoldering home shortly before 1 a.m. Thursday.

In the same barricaded bedroom they found the body of Jessica Taylor, 8, and her critically burned brother, Michael A. Taylor Jr., 6. Miller said Moore had doused the children with a flammable substance and set them on fire.

"He used coals from a wood stove burning in the house, spread the coals around the house, put some kind of flammable liquid on the kids and then set them on fire," Miller said.

Patrolman Don Ash said the girl had also been shot in the leg but apparently died of burns and smoke inhalation.

Miller said Moore had been charged last week in nearby Clay County, Mo., with a sex offense involving the girl, daughter of his cousin, Michael A. Taylor Sr., 28.

The senior Taylor, shot in the head during an exchange of gunfire with Moore, was in surgery at the University of Kansas Medical Center until shortly after noon Thursday. His condition was not immediately available.

Bank closings tie last year's record

TOPEKA — Kansas tied last year's post-depression record of 13 bank failures Thursday, when state banking officials declared the Hoxie State Bank insolvent and ordered it closed.

The failed bank was to reopen today as the Prairie State Bank, a newly chartered subsidiary of Prairie Bancshares Inc., of Oakley, said Bill Olcheski, a spokesman for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

State Banking Commissioner Eugene T. Barrett closed the bank just before noon and said officials determined that the institution was involvent during an examination Oct. 17. Barrett appointed the FDIC as receiver.

Evan Dannells, a kindergartener at Amanda Arnold Elementary School, pets a hedgehog held by a volunteer from the Sunset Zoo Thursday afternoon. Don Wixom, educational coordinator for the Sunset Zoo, not pictured, brought animals to the school so students could learn about the animals' characteristics and habitats.

Zoo seeks to educate people about animals, dispel fear, ignorance

By LORI STEVENS
Collegian Reporter

The Sunset Zoo has proven education is not exclusively acquired at a college or university. About one dozen animals at the zoo are currently used for educational purposes.

Don Wixom, curator of education at the zoo, said the animals are used as ambassadors to teach people about animals.

"Our goal is not to get people to want to keep animals as pets," Wixom said. "We emphasize that they are specially trained, specially fed and specially handled.

"People grow up with predisposed ideas about animals, which they receive from Disney and story books. We want to set the record straight. Snakes are not bad animals."

Wixom said the basis for fear of certain animals is ignorance. The Sunset Zoo is trying to teach proper attitudes about animals. He said that this year the zoo has served more than 15,000 people through its educational programs.

Some of the animals the zoo uses for education are hawks, owls and other birds of prey that have been injured in the wild. If their injuries are too severe, such as missing part of a wing, the birds cannot be rehabilitated. Therefore, the animal must be put to sleep or given to the zoo.

Some animals have been received from other zoos. And still others have been former pets, such as snakes and parrots.

The Sunset Zoo also has a docent program, started in 1981. A docent is a volunteer teacher, Wixom said. The majority of docents are pre-veterinary or biology students, but anyone living in the Manhattan area can become involved with the training.

In the training program, the docents learn about nutrition for the animals, habitat, hand-rearing of the young, care of endangered wildlife and zoo economics.

One activity that involves docents is the emu egg watch. The emu, an Australian ostrich-like bird, lays eggs in the summer in Australia. But in Kansas, it now lays eggs during the winter months, Wixom said.

'People grow up with predisposed ideas about animals, which they receive from Disney and story books. We want to set the record straight.'

—Don Wixom

In captivity, the male emu does not sit on the eggs like he does in the wild. The docents must watch from 5 p.m. to midnight, when the emu lays eggs, so eggs may be collected and placed in the incubator to hatch.

Another part of the program was a "sloth bear watch." When the sloth bear became pregnant, an all-night watch was set up to keep an eye on her.

Participants in the docent program gain a lot of experience and knowledge. Wixom said the program is particularly helpful for students enrolled in pre-veterinary medicine.

Report cites two decades of civil strife

By The Associated Press

GUATEMALA CITY — More than 100,000 civilians have been killed in Central American civil strife during the past two decades, according to a human rights report by a commission of the Organization of American States.

The report, submitted to a general meeting of the 31-member OAS on Wednesday, said abuse of human rights is the Western Hemisphere's gravest problem and singled out eight member nations as abusers: El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Chile, Cuba, Haiti, Paraguay and Suriname.

The full OAS is to vote Friday on whether to accept the 211-page report by its Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

While the foreign ministers debated the report, a group of Guatemalans known as the Mutual Support Group protested outside the hotel where the meeting is being held. They demanded that the civilian Guatemalan government of President Vinicio Cerezo account for people kidnapped and presumably killed under past military regimes.

The commission report did not explain how it reached its estimate of 100,000 civilians killed in Central America.

However, Guatemalan human rights activists estimate 38,000 people, mostly civilians, have been killed or kidnapped by the military in 20 years of fighting between government troops and leftist rebels.

In El Salvador at least 62,000 people, most of them non-combatants, have died since 1979 in the civil war between leftist guerrillas and the government.

The commission report said that in Guatemala, human rights abuses have fallen sharply since Cerezo's inauguration in January. He is Guatemala's first civilian president since 1970.

Tax act requires individual ID number

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Although the year 1984 has passed, another of George Orwell's prophecies from his book, 1984, has come true in the form of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, which requires all individuals, beginning at age 5, to have a tax identification number.

Individuals ages 5 and above will need a TIN for 1987 tax claims or they will be fined $5, said Curtis Dean, certified public accountant with Sink, Gillmore and Gordon Public Accountants in Manhattan.

A TIN is more commonly known as a social security number, originally given to individuals to keep track of their retirement earnings in the social security system.

In 1943, President Franklin Roosevelt stated the social security numbering system will be used for all federal numbering purposes, said Leon Rettenmaier, insurance programs specialist for the Social Security Administration.

Rettenmaier said this system eliminated the possiblity of, and the expense for, additional federal numbering systems. Since then, the social security number has been used for various government and private organizations for the purpose of identification.

The Social Security Administraton handles 12 to 15 million applications for social security numbers each year. The workload will increase from nine to 12 million for 1987, Rettenmaier said.

The increased workload will cost the Social Security Administration an additional $47 million, according to a memorandum plan by the field liaison and support staff of Social Security, dated Aug. 20, 1986. The Social Security Administration budgets about $65 million for a normal year to process social security applications.

Fred Hagen, branch manager of the Manhattan Social Security office, said the office will publicize the need for individuals to have a TIN under the new Tax Reform Act. Local publicity efforts will include letters to schools and advertising on radio and in newspapers.

The Social Security Administration has two plans for targeting those individuals who do not have TINs.

The first plan is to utilize the school system. Cooperating schools will send information packets home with the students so parents can fill out the application for a TIN. Instructions will tell the parents what identification is necessary for the child to get a TIN.

A social security employee will come to the school to review the applications and the evidence. The social security card for each person will be mailed to the home.

The second plan is for the Internal Revenue Service to mail information packets to those taxpayers who have dependents listed on their 1986 tax claims that do not have TINs. These individuals can mail their application or go to their local Social Security office to have the application and evidence reviewed.

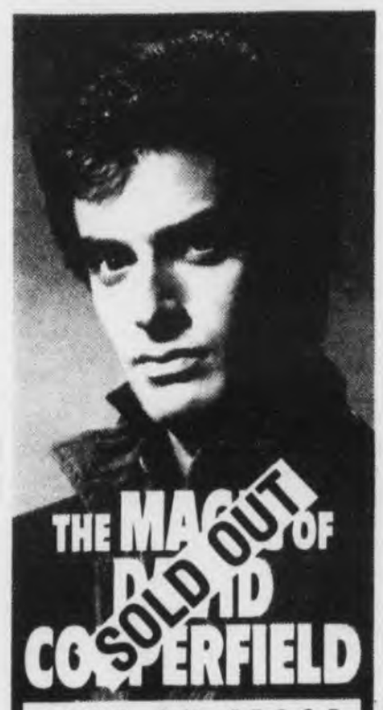
The evidence requirements will not change from present standards, Rettenmaier said.

The workload for the Manhattan office is expected to increase about 10 percent, or about 600 applications for the 1987 year, Hagen said.

The increase is small compared to most of the country because many of the banks in the area require individuals to have social security numbers for savings accounts, he said.

Although the Social Security Administration will have an increased workload for 12 to 15 months, the office is not planning on hiring additional employees. If a particular office cannot handle its workload increase, some of it will be distributed through the system to offices who have more time, Rettenmaier said.

Dean said he speculates the reason for individuals 5 and up to have TINs is to cross check tax claims and verify that all income is taxed.



The new rules require dependents under the age of 14, with interest income of more than $1,000, to pay taxes at their parents' rate.

This, Dean said, is to deter wealthy parents from giving their children huge amounts of money to avoid paying higher taxes on it. Children, age 14 and over, will pay taxes at their own rate, Dean said.

During 1987, the Social Security Administration will utilize extensive national publicity to make parents aware their children need TINs. This also will be the year for enumerating most of these individuals.

Congress, since the early '70s, has pushed for more stringent requirements for evidence in order to maintain the integrity of the social security number, according to the field liaison and support staff memorandum and plan. The memorandum also states that Congress believes this is important due to the increased usage of social security numbers for other purposes.

Court ruling violates privacy of residents

Seemingly, all the archaic laws governing marriage and the "family situation" were discarded years ago. However, the Missouri Court of Appeals has chosen to uphold one of the most ludicrous and outdated rulings to surface in some years regarding marital status.

A couple living together — but not legally married — is being forced to move from their suburban St. Louis home because local property is zoned one-family residential and their living situation violates the ordinance. A man and his child and a women and her two children live together in a seven-bedroom, four-bathroom house in the posh suburb of Ladue.

Despite the fact the couple shares a common bedroom, maintains a joint checking account for the household expenses, eats their meals together, entertains together and disciplines each other's children, the living arrangement does not give the couple the status of a family, the court ruled.

This ruling is absurd for two reasons. First, one could argue the things these five people do together and the way they live could constitute the word "family." There are many "legal" families that would envy this "illegal" one.

Second, this ruling invades one's private affairs, much the same way Georgia's anti-sodomy ruling did. The invasion of matters pertaining only to private situations is becoming more frequent.

Although the Ladue ordinance and the Court of Appeals ruling are only local, such a ruling could set precedents for communities with similar laws across the country.

Certainly, there are other family matters more urgent for the nation's court system to hear than this one.

Reagan's image bluffs press, public

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

There is a certain mystique shared by many columnists who comment on current political events — the anti-Reagan mystique. Generally described, such columnists believe the Reagan presidency is about the worst political entity imaginable — one that promotes elitist, reactionary policies that create an unjust, militaristic world.

A good example of what I'm talking about can be found in the first columns I wrote for the Collegian. I began this job in the fall of 1984 and soon fell into the regular pattern of bringing Ronnie and his politics onto center stage once a week, slapping them around with my word processor for 15 to 20 inches, and leaving the Collegian newsroom with a nice feeling of self-righteousness.

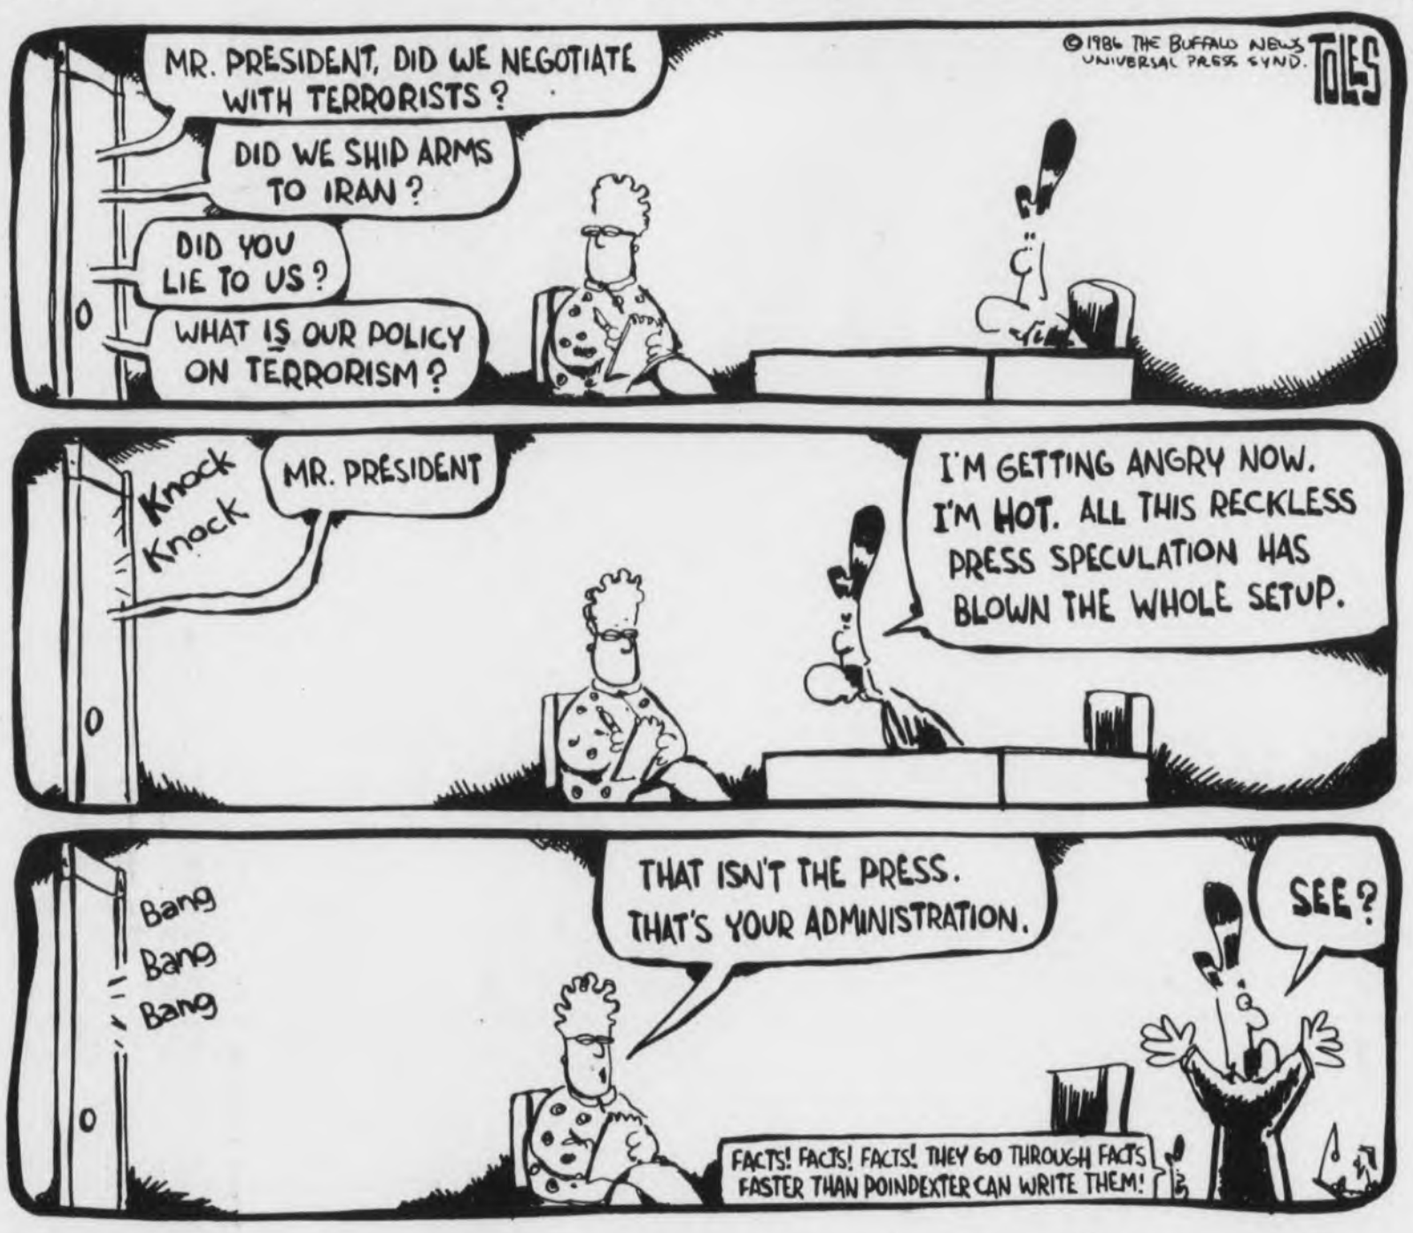
It seems to me that arguing with 60 percent of the American electorate is a pretty presumptuous, even arrogant, thing for a 20-year-old undergrad to do. I'm not backing away from my opposition to the president. After spending a year overseas, I am more convinced than ever that Reagan's policies are reprehensible, but I believe some of the strong emotions I felt toward Ronald have subsided, and I can now take a more objective look at his popular presidency.

The first thing one must consider when analyzing Ronald Reagan as president is that he is very good at what he does. A president should be able to communicate well with the American public. He should be able to work with Congress to keep the legislative process moving. He should define a course of action and be able to stick to it when fringe elements attempt to sway him. Alternately, a president must know when flexibility is called for and be able to alter policy without losing face.

Reagan has shown outstanding ability in all of these areas except for flexibility. His ability to use the media is so well-known that it need not be taken up here. He has accumulated a legislative record that has accomplished nearly all of his presidential goals: tax cuts, tax reform, social program cuts, anti-drug legislation and a massive increase in defense spending, including Strategic Defense Initiative, contra aid, MX missile and B-1 bomber funding.

Reagan has displayed unrivaled statesmanship in his ability to withstand criticism. The flash polls after the Iceland summit were unfavorable to Reagan, but after he spoke to the American public, the polls quickly turned around. And certainly no other president I can think of could have said "We start bombing (the Soviet Union) in five minutes," or that "Trees and other plants are the main sources of pollution," and not suffered politically.

My criticism of Reagan isn't directed at his presidential abilities, but at what he does with those abilities. The analogy I often use is that of a good frame surrounding a bad picture.



National polls have consistently shown that the American public disagrees with many, often most, of Reagan's policies, but continues to like and support the man personally. Unfortunately, Reagan and his policies go hand in hand. You can't support Reagan and be for a stronger environmental ethic. You can't support Reagan and be for more personal liberties or more student aid or less contra aid or a space program that isn't based on militarizing the final frontier.

I think there's something to be said against a president who can completely divorce himself from the policies he espouses. True, one must be able to handle his critics, but a president should suffer politically when he jokes about bombing the Soviet Union, or when his campaign acquires the opponent's debate strategy before the debate, or when his administration defies Congress and illegally ships arms to the contras or to Iran.

I think Reagan's popularity is based mainly on his ability to tell Americans what they want to hear and make it sound convincing. He makes the complicated problems of the world very understandable. Nuclear Arms? We'll build a machine and they won't work anymore. Terrorism? Evil men like Gadhafy start it. Nicaragua? It's the communists. As singer Gil Scott said, "Ron takes us back to the time when movies were in black and white...and so was everything else."

But movies aren't in black and white anymore and everything else never was. The world's problems can't be reduced to simple good and evil, right and wrong equations to be solved by simple solutions. Capable presidents with harmful policies will be capable of causing more harm.

Columnists with rational criticisms and viable solutions may be able to convince one or two readers to think about alternatives.

Pledges' grades count

Editor,

Imagine this scenario: a K-State instructor is approached by one of his or her students who asks, "Could you please write down my current grade and attendance level in your course, so I can send it home to my mommy?"

Now, imagine a similar scenario, only the student asks, "Could you please write down my grade and attendance level, because the fraternity I belong to requires it as part of our pledge program?"

Let me hazard a guess that, in scenario one, the instructor would say with a broad smile and slap on the back, "Why sure, let me get my Bic!"

However, after informing the pledges of my fraternity over two weeks ago to obtain grade reports from their instructors, they've met with considerable difficulty from some instructors. Responses have ranged from "Gee, I can't do that, you need the dean's permission," to "Why do fraternities always want grade reports?" Some pledges have even received lectures on the evils of the modern-day fraternity. Excuse me? These comments come from University instructors when a student simply wants to know how he is doing in a course?

We require our pledges to obtain written grade reports from their instructors several times a semester. Why? Hmmm...let's see. The pledge (usually a first-semester freshman) gets to actually know what his current grade status is instead of figuring, "Well, I've got a B and C on two quizzes, and a D on the test — I must be getting a C!" And thirdly, (I hope you're sitting — this is a shocker) those crazy fraternity boys really do care about scholarship! By knowing how our members are doing in school, we can offer assistance when needed, instead of being unaware of a pledge's poor performance. Gee, what a concept.

Intentional baiting

Columnist goofs again

Editor,

Re: Kirk Caraway's column, "Writer says 'thanks' for comments," in Monday's Collegian.

I want to explain something. I could not state all the goofs Caraway made in his columns because of limited space. So I tried to make my letter short and to the point. And Caraway, assuming I stated only one of the many, has goofed again.

Ancient was the first. I stated a second. It is the second to last paragraph. In it, I say that he wants Falwell and Robertson out of the way so he and his friends may indulge in the freedoms he spoke of. Remember what they were? Abortion, drugs, homosexuality and casual sex. That's what his column stated. I naturally assumed that it was a mistake on his part, for it states that he thinks abortion, drugs, homosexuality and casual sex are OK. But with his column in Monday's paper, I guess I was wrong.

As for ancient, one can argue about its meaning. It does, of course, mean old. But so does antique. Would one say that the Bible is an antique? Would one call their grandparents ancient? I don't know; maybe Caraway would.

The truth of the matter is that the Bible is as new today as it was in the past. If it's ancient, then you can't use it. And as I said before — millions and millions of people use the Bible every day.

The other goofs he made I don't have the space to go into detail about. The first one I noticed was totalitarian. This isn't Pat Robertson. I don't know about Jerry Falwell.

Caraway says that totalitarian is where personal freedoms are restricted. What freedoms are those? Refer back to that second mistake I stated — homosexuality, drugs and casual sex. If that's the kind of freedoms he wants, then he can have it.

Student cheaters bad

Editor,

Forget about the problem with the disturbance in Aggieville hurting K-State's reputation. We have a much bigger problem that is hurting K-State's academic credibility. The problem is the amount of cheating going on at K-State. There are many different forms in which this cheating has been occurring. The problem extends from cheating on exams to plagiarism on essays and research papers. According to K-State's policy on academic honesty, these methods are illegal and are punishable by the minimum of failing the examination and the course. The maximum penalty is dismissal from the University.

That may sound like it would take care of the problem, but the problem lies elsewhere. The problem is that there is a lack of enforcing these laws. All students are aware that cheating goes on, but they don't seem to be doing anything about it. Some of the faculty turn their heads and allow cheating to go on.

The administration, faculty and students should take measures to see that the amount of cheating is reduced. If this cheating is allowed to go on it will hurt the University's academic credibility. As it is now, a student can cheat his way through college and obtain a degree. When the company that hires him finds out that the person doesn't know anything, the employer will blame the University. The word will travel fast throughout the business world. The first thing you know is that the companies aren't hiring students from K-State.

Families make tough times liveable

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

I don't know about anyone else, but this has been one of those semesters, or would it be more accurate to say, "one of those lifetimes?" Anyway, it's turning into a semester I would rather not repeat.

Once in awhile, I need to complain about my life and the world in general. The last few weeks have been like that — constant complaining. It's one of the ways I manage to cope. But despite my grumblings, I am very lucky.

My life has not been filled with a great deal of hardship. I have a loving and supportive family, a small but strong circle of friends, a wide and diverse group of acquaintances and a variety of interests. I have had it fairly easy when it comes to grades in school, to learning work skills and in making friends.

My health is OK — despite the terrible eyesight I managed to inherit. I've never broken a bone or had a serious illness. I manage to eat fairly well as evidenced by my somewhat annoying weight problem. I have the time, freedom and (sometimes) the money to do what I want, whenever I want. All in all, I've been very lucky in this lifetime.

There have been times I thought otherwise.

For example, one time was during 7th grade when I hated my hair, my name and was probably the most shy person you would ever not want to meet. Or during high school, I was so self-conscious that my hands shook when I had to talk to people I didn't usually associate with — like those in the so-called "popular" group and even the people I'd gone to school with since kindergarten. My first job wasn't the best of times, with horrendous hours and a boring town.

I've managed to open my mouth on several occasions it should have been kept closed. I feel out of place sometimes, like I'm on the outside looking in, but I usually fit in wherever I am and with whatever group I happen to be with. I tend to be lonely, even in a crowd sometimes. But I can cope.

Two of my most traumatic times have been when my heart was trampled on — not completely crushed — and when my maternal grandfather died.

It's strange how one event will stand out from all others, especially considering I wasn't thinking about those two topics when I began writing this column.

My grandfather's death and the funeral are very vivid to me. To this day, I sometimes get a lump in my throat when I pass a cemetery or when I hear a rendition of "Amazing Grace." There are times the tears start to flow for no apparent reason, and I will suddenly realize I've been thinking about him and still — and will always — miss him. The tears even started while I was writing this.

If I can become anything in this life, it is to emulate my maternal grandfather and grandmother. Both helped show a self-conscious, shy little girl the road to becoming a grown-up.

A friend once told me my grandmother was the perfect example of a lady. If my grandmother is a lady, then my grandfather was a gentleman, a person who operated on honor and love — definitely not bad examples for me or anyone else to follow.

I am continually amazed by the depth of talent and versatility within my own family. My grandparents are only two examples.

I have three talented and pretty sisters. My mother is a whiz at just about everything. My dad can answer any question asked of him by inquiring little girls and is the epitome of patience during a shopping spree by four daughters.

My nephew is almost 3 years old, and grandmom and granddad's house holds a constant fascination for this precocious "rugrat." He is fascinating to me as well. I can't imagine having a child of my own, but I can definitely spoil the nieces and nephews added to the family. In addition, I now have the two older brothers I sure could have used during high school.

I also have the fortune to be related to another lady of a grandmother and a variety of talented, funny and loving aunts, uncles and cousins on both sides of my family.

You might get the idea I'm proud of my family. You're right. It's also something I don't tell them often enough. They are very special to me and I wouldn't trade them for anything or anyone in the world.

If I have been lucky in this lifetime and in this world I have made for myself, it is a direct result of the influence my family has and continues to have on me. I trust them and would do anything I possibly could for them. I love them — and that is not a word or a sentiment I bestow easily or indiscriminately.

Overall, it's not been a bad lifetime. It's had its ups and downs, its good times and its bad. But it has been, and still is, a good life. I wouldn't change anything — except, I sure wish I could go back to 7th grade and learn to be myself earlier. It wasn't fun shaking in my shoes every time I had to speak in front of a class or with those outside of my small, tight group of bookworm friends.

It was tough being 13 — 30 isn't much easier, but my abilities to cope and to "fake it" have increased. Maybe that's the other secret to my luck — if in doubt, fake it.

Swine Day sessions include studies on marketing hogs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers, meeting at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome for Swine Day, were welcomed Thursday morning by University President Jon Wefald.

Wefald encouraged producers to work together with K-State so that agriculture can flourish in Kansas.

"We had a good crowd this year and a good program," said Gary Allee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

He said approximately 400 people attended Swine Day and visited the Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show.

Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Robert Hines, professor of animal sciences and industry, discussed production aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

As weight increases, feed requirements increase and average daily gain decreases, causing hogs to become fatter, Hines said. Also, heavier hogs require more feeding floor space.

During the seminar sessions, Allee discussed the economic aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

Producers need to figure facility costs, rate-of-gain costs and feed efficiency costs needed to produce heavier hogs, Allee said.

"After this is done, a decision can be made whether or not to produce heavy (260-280 lbs.) hogs or average-weight (210-240 lbs.) hogs," he said.

Lean-value marketing programs were discussed by Paul Maxson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

The programs focus attention on providing pork producers with an economic incentive to raise lean, meaty hogs.

Most producers market hogs on a live-weight basis. The lean value program starts with the carcass. Producers receive payment based on the grade and yield of the carcass, Maxson said.

Jim Nelssen, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, explained a complex, high-nutrient density diet for baby pigs.

"Young pigs can utilize fat quite efficiently," Nelssen said. Starter diets normally don't include a large amount of fat.

"A producer can double his money by getting young pigs off to a better start," Nelssen said.

The pork producers also received an update report concerning K-State research on a variety of topics, followed by an open house of the K-State Swine Research Center.

Rangers vie for 8-man competition in future ROTC challenge contest

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's ROTC Rangers are preparing for what could be called the "Superstars" competition of the ROTC.

In preparation for the Ranger Challenge Competition, a training session will be at 7 a.m. Saturday at Fort Riley.

K-State has 20 Rangers who will be vying to become members of the eight-man squad with one alternate member. This team will compete statewide and possibly nationally, said Steve Hood, Ranger commander and senior in secondary education.

All universities with ROTC units in this region must have a team, and these teams will compete to find out who has the best Ranger Platoon, Hood said.

The competition will include a 10-kilometer fighting road march, which is a combination of running and walking; a hand-grenade assault course; weapons assembly; land navigation; building a one-rope bridge; marksmanship; and knot-tieing competitions, said Captain Douglas Booker, associate professor of military science.

Anyone enrolled in Army or Air Force ROTC who can accomplish a set of tasks, including tests of physical and mental strength, can become a Ranger, said Mike Kupsch, platoon sergeant and junior in political science.

The fitness competition includes swimming 15 meters in fatigues with a rifle and other minor equipment, Kupsch said.

"The Rangers is not for everyone," he said. "We are looking for people that like to challenge themselves, those that have a little bit more push than the average ROTC person."

"When I joined ROTC, I wanted something more challenging and that's what being a Ranger means," said Kupsch, a former Green Beret.

"In the regular Army, there are Rangers who are the sneak-and-peak, light guys," Booker said. "They are, in a sense, the elite; they would be the first to go into combat.

"K-State's Rangers are a smaller mirror image of the regular Army. They just do Ranger-type training, which is a little bit more than everyone else (in ROTC)."

Hood plans to compete and said the team has a "lead" on the other schools because K-State's Ranger program was well established before the platoon became involved in the Ranger Challenge Competition.

K-State's Rangers have a year to prepare for the final competition, which Booker said will be next March.

ASK lobbies for student interests

By The Collegian Staff

Although Associated Students of Kansas no longer lobbies for the deregulation of marijuana like it did in the early '70s, its purpose has remained the same — representing student issues to the state legislature, said Patty Hipsher, campus director of ASK.

Hipsher, senior in political science, spoke Thursday in the Union Courtyard as part of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas series, "Let's Talk About It."

ASK has two functions: to represent the students to the state legislature, school administrators, the Board of Regents and others and to educate the students about issues that affect them, said Hipsher.

ASK wants to increase student salaries on campus by 8 percent based on merit and longevity. This is to reward students who have worked at the same job for several years and who still receive minimum wage, Hipsher said.

The Policy and Projects Committee of ASK will vote and prioritize issues they want to concentrate on during their next legislative session, faculty evaluations.

After a policy change in February, Hipsher said campus representatives can now lobby for issues pertinent to individual colleges and universities.

Last session, representatives of the University of Kansas concentrated on outdoor lighting, while K-State targeted its efforts on handicapped accessibility to buildings and funding for Farrell Library, she said.

Swine Day sessions include studies on marketing hogs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers, meeting at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome for Swine Day, were welcomed Thursday morning by University President Jon Wefald.

Wefald encouraged producers to work together with K-State so that agriculture can flourish in Kansas.

"We had a good crowd this year and a good program," said Gary Allee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

He said approximately 400 people attended Swine Day and visited the Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show.

Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Robert Hines, professor of animal sciences and industry, discussed production aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

As weight increases, feed requirements increase and average daily gain decreases, causing hogs to become fatter, Hines said. Also, heavier hogs require more feeding floor space.

During the seminar sessions, Allee discussed the economic aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

Producers need to figure facility costs, rate-of-gain costs and feed efficiency costs needed to produce heavier hogs, Allee said.

"After this is done, a decision can be made whether or not to produce heavy (260-280 lbs.) hogs or average-weight (210-240 lbs.) hogs," he said.

Lean-value marketing programs were discussed by Paul Maxson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

The programs focus attention on providing pork producers with an economic incentive to raise lean, meaty hogs.

Most producers market hogs on a live-weight basis. The lean value program starts with the carcass. Producers receive payment based on the grade and yield of the carcass, Maxson said.

Jim Nelssen, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, explained a complex, high-nutrient density diet for baby pigs.

"Young pigs can utilize fat quite efficiently," Nelssen said. Starter diets normally don't include a large amount of fat.

"A producer can double his money by getting young pigs off to a better start," Nelssen said.

The pork producers also received an update report concerning K-State research on a variety of topics, followed by an open house of the K-State Swine Research Center.

Rangers vie for 8-man competition in future ROTC challenge contest

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's ROTC Rangers are preparing for what could be called the "Superstars" competition of the ROTC.

In preparation for the Ranger Challenge Competition, a training session will be at 7 a.m. Saturday at Fort Riley.

K-State has 20 Rangers who will be vying to become members of the eight-man squad with one alternate member. This team will compete statewide and possibly nationally, said Steve Hood, Ranger commander and senior in secondary education.

All universities with ROTC units in this region must have a team, and these teams will compete to find out who has the best Ranger Platoon, Hood said.

The competition will include a 10-kilometer fighting road march, which is a combination of running and walking; a hand-grenade assault course; weapons assembly; land navigation; building a one-rope bridge; marksmanship; and knot-tieing competitions, said Captain Douglas Booker, associate professor of military science.

Anyone enrolled in Army or Air Force ROTC who can accomplish a set of tasks, including tests of physical and mental strength, can become a Ranger, said Mike Kupsch, platoon sergeant and junior in political science.

The fitness competition includes swimming 15 meters in fatigues with a rifle and other minor equipment, Kupsch said.

"The Rangers is not for everyone," he said. "We are looking for people that like to challenge themselves, those that have a little bit more push than the average ROTC person."

"When I joined ROTC, I wanted something more challenging and that's what being a Ranger means," said Kupsch, a former Green Beret.

"In the regular Army, there are Rangers who are the sneak-and-peak, light guys," Booker said. "They are, in a sense, the elite; they would be the first to go into combat.

"K-State's Rangers are a smaller mirror image of the regular Army. They just do Ranger-type training, which is a little bit more than everyone else (in ROTC)."

Hood plans to compete and said the team has a "lead" on the other schools because K-State's Ranger program was well established before the platoon became involved in the Ranger Challenge Competition.

K-State's Rangers have a year to prepare for the final competition, which Booker said will be next March.

ASK lobbies for student interests

By The Collegian Staff

Although Associated Students of Kansas no longer lobbies for the deregulation of marijuana like it did in the early '70s, its purpose has remained the same — representing student issues to the state legislature, said Patty Hipsher, campus director of ASK.

Hipsher, senior in political science, spoke Thursday in the Union Courtyard as part of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas series, "Let's Talk About It."

ASK has two functions: to represent the students to the state legislature, school administrators, the Board of Regents and others and to educate the students about issues that affect them, said Hipsher.

faculty evaluations.

ASK wants to increase student salaries on campus by 8 percent based on merit and longevity. This is to reward students who have worked at the same job for several years and who still receive minimum wage, Hipsher said.

The Policy and Projects Committee of ASK will vote and prioritize issues they want to concentrate on during their next legislative session,

After a policy change in February, Hipsher said campus representatives can now lobby for issues pertinent to individual colleges and universities.

Last session, representatives of the University of Kansas concentrated on outdoor lighting, while K-State targeted its efforts on handicapped accessibility to buildings and funding for Farrell Library, she said.

Speaker says communication, respect vital in farm operation

The family farm is a team effort, and every member has to have a chance to contribute to the farm operation, said Ron Hanson, professor of agricultural economics at the University of Nebraska.

Hanson, who has been working with farm families for nine years, said he has never charged a dollar for his counseling.

Hanson said there are four aspects critical for a family farm.

Family communications are important, Hanson said, adding that the inability to communicate as a family will cause personal lives and jealousies must be kept out of the business.

Recognition that a farm wife receives from her husband is cited as the third aspect critical to the family farm. A wife plays a major role in a family farm, and it is important for the wife to be recognized, Hanson said.

world. This separates John and his lover long enough to end their affair.

Eventually, Constance leaves on a vacation with Bernard, an old flame played by Erik Bruce, freshman in theater. Bernard loves Constance, but she doesn't reciprocate that love.

"The problem at the end of the play is whether or not John will accept (Constance's trip with Bernard)," Wondra said. "She's more worried about John than about herself. She is concerned about him agonizing over it and wants to make it as painless as possible for him."

Though Constance is worried about her husband's reaction to her affair, she needs to go through with it anyway, Anderson said.

"As she watches John sort of entranced by his new love affair, I think there's a part of her that longs for recapturing the excitement of love again," Anderson explained.

"'I'm going because I want to be in love again, just for a little while,' Constance says. She doesn't love Bernard; he doesn't amuse her," Wondra said. "They're friends, but she doesn't have the respect for him that she has for John."

Throughout the play, Constance's mother and sister are puzzled by her actions. Her mother blames Constance for John's infidelity and disapproves of her vacation with Bernard. At first, Constance doesn't understand why her husband is cheating either, Wondra said.

"She didn't understand why things that happened to other people when their spouses wander were (now) happening to her," Wondra said. "She was puzzled and a bit angry at first. She regrets that she took it much too personally at first. John still loves her, but he needed something different from this other woman. And she comes to realize that that's all right as long as he still loves her."

John Middleton is played by Mark Cross, sophomore in theater. Cross molded his character by doing improvisational scenes with Wondra and watching old Cary Grant movies and Robert Wagner in "Hart to Hart."

"I tried to take a mature man with a rich man with a gentleman with the type of person that would cheat on his wife and combine them together," Cross said.

John's affair with Marie-Louise is nothing new for her. Marie-Louise, played by Tamara Grothaus, freshman in music, is married to a rich man. However, she flaunts his money, lies and has affairs even while on a cruise with her husband, Wondra said.

"(Constance) thinks Marie-Louise is generous and good-natured but at the same time is an 'immoral little beast,'" Wondra said.

The cast of "The Constant Wife" is a combination of new and seasoned actors on K-State stages. Anderson tries not to look for preconceived characteristics when casting her plays, but said the combination for this play is interesting.

"You're looking for a quality about them that is in contrast with someone else. Sometimes it involves the way they look or sound. Sometimes it involves the kind of rhythm they give off as a person," Anderson said.

Other cast members are Mrs. Culver, Constance's mother, played by Megan Garner, junior in theater; her sister Martha, played by Nancy Sloan, senior in theater; Bentley, played by Victor Force, graduate student in speech; Barbara Fawcett, Constance's friend, played by Susanne Leipold, graduate student in speech; and Mortimer Durham, Marie-Louise's husband, played by Scott Kelly, senior in theater.

Tickets for "The Constant Wife" are available at the Nichols Hall box office Monday through Friday from noon to 5 p.m. General admission is $5; admission for students and senior citizens is $3.

Mrs. Culver, center, portrayed by Megan Garner, explains that men are naturally prone to infidelity, as Constance's little sister Martha Culver, played by Nancy Sloan, and John listen to the conversation.

Abrupt twist ruins actors' performances

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Charlie Driggs is a New York executive. He dresses in two-piece suits, carries an electronic pager in his breast pocket and owns a spacious home on Long Island. By appearances his life seems well-ordered and practical, until, that is, he meets a wild, Scotch-swigging woman named Lulu who dresses like a Chinese call girl. After they meet he'll never be the same.

Jeff Daniels ("Terms of Endearment," "The Purple Rose of Cairo") stars as Charlie Driggs in "Something Wild," the new film by director Jonathan Demme ("Stop Making Sense," "Melvin and Howard"). And Melanie Griffith (the best thing in the otherwise disappointing "Body Double") plays Lulu. Daniels is all innocence, a Frank Capra-esque hero, while Griffith has an evocative, breathy voice, vaguely reminiscent of Marilyn Monroe.

The first half of the film follows what happens when Lulu kidnaps Charlie. After she sees him sneak out of a greasy-spoon restaurant without paying his bill, she follows him and talks him into taking a ride in her car. She's so charming he can't quite resist.

Before long, though, she has him handcuffed to the headboard of a bed while she rips his clothes to shreds. "I just want you to know I've never done anything like this before," Charlie says. "Don't worry, Charlie," says Lulu. "I have."

"Something Wild" is the latest in a recent wave of movies about executives with drab lives who are led into the wild life by adventurous women. Just last year, there was Martin Scorsese's "After Hours" and John Landis' "Into the Night."

"Something Wild" isn't in the same class as Scorsese's movie, but it does have its share of excellent moments, as when Lulu takes Charlie to meet her mother. While she tries passing him off as her new husband, the mood is warm and gentle, yet funny.

Next she takes Charlie to her

Swine Day sessions include studies on marketing hogs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers, meeting at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome for Swine Day, were welcomed Thursday morning by University President Jon Wefald.

Wefald encouraged producers to work together with K-State so that agriculture can flourish in Kansas.

"We had a good crowd this year and a good program," said Gary Allee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

He said approximately 400 people attended Swine Day and visited the Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show.

Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Robert Hines, professor of animal sciences and industry, discussed production aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

As weight increases, feed requirements increase and average daily gain decreases, causing hogs to become fatter, Hines said. Also, heavier hogs require more feeding floor space.

During the seminar sessions, Allee discussed the economic aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

Producers need to figure facility costs, rate-of-gain costs and feed efficiency costs needed to produce heavier hogs, Allee said.

"After this is done, a decision can be made whether or not to produce heavy (260-280 lbs.) hogs or average-weight (210-240 lbs.) hogs," he said.

Lean-value marketing programs were discussed by Paul Maxson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

The programs focus attention on providing pork producers with an economic incentive to raise lean, meaty hogs.

Most producers market hogs on a live-weight basis. The lean value program starts with the carcass. Producers receive payment based on the grade and yield of the carcass, Maxson said.

Jim Nelssen, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, explained a complex, high-nutrient density diet for baby pigs.

"Young pigs can utilize fat quite efficiently," Nelssen said. Starter diets normally don't include a large amount of fat.

"A producer can double his money by getting young pigs off to a better start," Nelssen said.

The pork producers also received an update report concerning K-State research on a variety of topics, followed by an open house of the K-State Swine Research Center.

Rangers vie for 8-man competition in future ROTC challenge contest

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's ROTC Rangers are preparing for what could be called the "Superstars" competition of the ROTC.

In preparation for the Ranger Challenge Competition, a training session will be at 7 a.m. Saturday at Fort Riley.

K-State has 20 Rangers who will be vying to become members of the eight-man squad with one alternate member. This team will compete statewide and possibly nationally, said Steve Hood, Ranger commander and senior in secondary education.

All universities with ROTC units in this region must have a team, and these teams will compete to find out who has the best Ranger Platoon, Hood said.

The competition will include a 10-kilometer fighting road march, which is a combination of running and walking; a hand-grenade assault course; weapons assembly; land navigation; building a one-rope bridge; marksmanship; and knot-tieing competitions, said Captain Douglas Booker, associate professor of military science.

Anyone enrolled in Army or Air Force ROTC who can accomplish a set of tasks, including tests of physical and mental strength, can become a Ranger, said Mike Kupsch, platoon sergeant and junior in political science.

The fitness competition includes swimming 15 meters in fatigues with a rifle and other minor equipment, Kupsch said.

"The Rangers is not for everyone," he said. "We are looking for people that like to challenge themselves, those that have a little bit more push than the average ROTC person."

"When I joined ROTC, I wanted something more challenging and that's what being a Ranger means," said Kupsch, a former Green Beret.

"In the regular Army, there are Rangers who are the sneak-and-peak, light guys," Booker said. "They are, in a sense, the elite; they would be the first to go into combat.

"K-State's Rangers are a smaller mirror image of the regular Army. They just do Ranger-type training, which is a little bit more than everyone else (in ROTC)."

Hood plans to compete and said the team has a "lead" on the other schools because K-State's Ranger program was well established before the platoon became involved in the Ranger Challenge Competition.

K-State's Rangers have a year to prepare for the final competition, which Booker said will be next March.

ASK lobbies for student interests

By The Collegian Staff

Although Associated Students of Kansas no longer lobbies for the deregulation of marijuana like it did in the early '70s, its purpose has remained the same — representing student issues to the state legislature, said Patty Hipsher, campus director of ASK.

Hipsher, senior in political science, spoke Thursday in the Union Courtyard as part of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas series, "Let's Talk About It."

ASK has two functions: to represent the students to the state legislature, school administrators, the Board of Regents and others and to educate the students about issues that affect them, said Hipsher.

faculty evaluations.

ASK wants to increase student salaries on campus by 8 percent based on merit and longevity. This is to reward students who have worked at the same job for several years and who still receive minimum wage, Hipsher said.

The Policy and Projects Committee of ASK will vote and prioritize issues they want to concentrate on during their next legislative session.

After a policy change in February, Hipsher said campus representatives can now lobby for issues pertinent to individual colleges and universities.

Last session, representatives of the University of Kansas concentrated on outdoor lighting, while K-State targeted its efforts on handicapped accessibility to buildings and funding for Farrell Library, she said.

Speaker says communication, respect vital in farm operation

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The family farm is a team effort, and every member has to have a chance to contribute to the farm operation, said Ron Hanson, professor of agricultural economics at the University of Nebraska.

Hanson, the featured speaker during Swine Day Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome, addre avoiding mistal that lead to fa flicts. Swine Da by the Departn Sciences and In Agricultural E tion.

Hanson, who has been working with farm families for nine years, said he has never charged a dollar for his counseling.

Hanson said there are four aspects critical for a family farm.

Family communications are important, Hanson said, adding that the inability to communicate as a family will cause sonal lives and jealousies must be kept out of the business.

Recognition that a farm wife receives from her husband is cited as the third aspect critical to the family farm. A wife plays a major role in a family farm, and it is important for the wife to be recognized, Hanson said.

"The true test of a farm marriage for the wife is sorting livestock with your husband," he

Students aid department's recruitment

By JOHN EVANS
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Speech is utilizing its faculty and students in its own effort to recruit students.

The purpose of this effort is to get more students to K-State and to give information about the speech and theater programs, said Harold Nichols, head of the speech department.

The department has been using direct mail to inform high school counselors and speech teachers of the qualities the programs offer.

Students have been working on committees developing ideas, and helping to write brochures, letters and other material. Students have also taken performances and workshops to high schools.

On Nov. 18, the department will host a workshop for 230 students from across the state. In the spring, high school students will bring one-act plays to campus to perform and have critiqued.

High school and community college students are the prime targets of the department, Nichols said. "We're trying to let them know what kind of training they can get here."

The effort has been beneficial. The number of inquiries has doubled from a year ago and the number of theater students has increased by one-third. The department is hoping the number of students will have increased by two-thirds by next year, Nichols said.

One of the factors contributing to the increase is the move the speech department made from East Stadium to Nichols Hall.

"The facilities in Nichols are the best between Denver and St. Louis," Nichols said. "It's hard convincing a starry-eyed student that working in the Purple Masque (Theatre) can be fun and educational."

While the recruitment of theater students has been on the rise, recruitment of speech pathology students has been lagging. Recruiting is difficult for speech pathology because high school students don't understand what it is about. Most become interested in pathology after they have had a course or two in the subject and have learned what it's about, Nichols said.

Swine Day sessions include studies on marketing hogs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers, meeting at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome for Swine Day, were welcomed Thursday morning by University President Jon Wefald.

Wefald encouraged producers to work together with K-State so that agriculture can flourish in Kansas.

"We had a good crowd this year and a good program," said Gary Allee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

He said approximately 400 people attended Swine Day and visited the Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show.

Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Robert Hines, professor of animal sciences and industry, discussed production aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

As weight increases, feed requirements increase and average daily gain decreases, causing hogs to become fatter, Hines said. Also, heavier hogs require more feeding floor space.

During the seminar sessions, Allee discussed the economic aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

Producers need to figure facility costs, rate-of-gain costs and feed efficiency costs needed to produce heavier hogs, Allee said.

"After this is done, a decision can be made whether or not to produce heavy (260-280 lbs.) hogs or average-weight (210-240 lbs.) hogs," he said.

Lean-value marketing programs were discussed by Paul Maxson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

The programs focus attention on providing pork producers with an economic incentive to raise lean, meaty hogs.

Most producers market hogs on a live-weight basis. The lean value program starts with the carcass. Producers receive payment based on the grade and yield of the carcass, Maxson said.

Jim Nelssen, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, explained a complex, high-nutrient density diet for baby pigs.

"Young pigs can utilize fat quite efficiently," Nelssen said. Starter diets normally don't include a large amount of fat.

"A producer can double his money by getting young pigs off to a better start," Nelssen said.

The pork producers also received an update report concerning K-State research on a variety of topics, followed by an open house of the K-State Swine Research Center.

Rangers vie for 8-man competition in future ROTC challenge contest

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's ROTC Rangers are preparing for what could be called the "Superstars" competition of the ROTC.

In preparation for the Ranger Challenge Competition, a training session will be at 7 a.m. Saturday at Fort Riley.

K-State has 20 Rangers who will be vying to become members of the eight-man squad with one alternate member. This team will compete statewide and possibly nationally, said Steve Hood, Ranger commander and senior in secondary education.

All universities with ROTC units in this region must have a team, and these teams will compete to find out who has the best Ranger Platoon, Hood said.

The competition will include a 10-kilometer fighting road march, which is a combination of running and walking; a hand-grenade assault course; weapons assembly; land navigation; building a one-rope bridge; marksmanship; and knot-tieing competitions, said Captain Douglas Booker, associate professor of military science.

Anyone enrolled in Army or Air Force ROTC who can accomplish a set of tasks, including tests of physical and mental strength, can become a Ranger, said Mike Kupsch, platoon sergeant and junior in political science.

The fitness competition includes swimming 15 meters in fatigues with a rifle and other minor equipment, Kupsch said.

"The Rangers is not for everyone," he said. "We are looking for people that like to challenge themselves, those that have a little bit more push than the average ROTC person."

"When I joined ROTC, I wanted something more challenging and that's what being a Ranger means," said Kupsch, a former Green Beret.

"In the regular Army, there are Rangers who are the sneak-and-peak, light guys," Booker said. "They are, in a sense, the elite; they would be the first to go into combat.

"K-State's Rangers are a smaller mirror image of the regular Army. They just do Ranger-type training, which is a little bit more than everyone else (in ROTC)."

Hood plans to compete and said the team has a "lead" on the other schools because K-State's Ranger program was well established before the platoon became involved in the Ranger Challenge Competition.

K-State's Rangers have a year to prepare for the final competition, which Booker said will be next March.

ASK lobbies for student interests

By The Collegian Staff

Although Associated Students of Kansas no longer lobbies for the deregulation of marijuana like it did in the early '70s, its purpose has remained the same — representing student issues to the state legislature, said Patty Hipsher, campus director of ASK.

Hipsher, senior in political science, spoke Thursday in the Union Courtyard as part of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas series, "Let's Talk About It."

ASK has two functions: to represent the students to the state

faculty evaluations.

ASK wants to increase student salaries on campus by 8 percent based on merit and longevity. This is to reward students who have worked at the same job for several years and who still receive minimum wage, Hipsher said.

The Policy and Projects Committee of ASK will vote and prioritize issues they want to concentrate on during their next legislative session.

After a policy change in February, Hipsher said campus representatives can now lobby for issues pertinent to individual colleges and universities.

Last session, representatives of the University of Kansas concentrated on outdoor lighting, while K-State targeted its efforts on handicapped accessibility to buildings and funding for Farrell Library, she said.

3 rounds with The Constant Wife

Marie-Louise Durham, portrayed by Tamara Grothaus, casts a flirtatious look toward her not-so-secret lover John Middleton, portrayed by Mark Cross.

Constance Middleton, played by Kelli Wondra, tries to explain to John that although she is devoted to him and their marriage, she doesn't love him.

Marriage may have its ups and downs, but not all couples go so far as to live in a boxing ring.

Constance and John Middleton do, though. Their story, "The Constant Wife" by W. Somerset Maugham, opened in Nichols Theatre Thursday night, the third K-State Players production this season. Performances continue at 8 p.m. today and Saturday and resume Nov. 19-22.

"The Constant Wife" is a dry comedy about infidelity and independence in 1927. While Constance knows her husband is having an affair with her best friend, she doesn't think the affair is any of her business. In fact, Constance denies that John is being unfaithful, even defending him to her family and friends. This confuses her family, friends and even her best friend's husband when he tries to tell her about the affair.

"It's not really for spite or vengeance or anything else," said director Kate Anderson, associate professor of speech. "One of the reasons she never confronted John about his affair with Marie-Louise is that she didn't feel qualified.

"She wasn't making a contribution to their livelihood and he was. She wants to find economic independence so she can make choices."

Although the play is set in the turn of the century, it still relates to the 1980s, Anderson said.

"We're still struggling with relationships. They're still contemporary issues. How to communicate and deal with people are still things we're interested in," she said.

Putting the play in a boxing ring was Anderson's idea. The action takes place in an elegant drawing room, but it is surrounded by ropes like a boxing ring. Each act is signaled by the butler, Bentley, who rings a bell at the beginning and end like a round of boxing.

The boxing ring concept has never been used before, Anderson said.

"We're sort of looking at it in Rounds 1, 2 and 3 instead of Acts 1, 2 and 3," she said. "We're looking at it from the view that people are sparring with new ideas and changes. They're trying to reach new plateaus in their relationships."

Kelli Wondra, graduate student in speech, plays Constance. Wondra said the boxing ring helps to keep her character in context, reminding her of the "verbal sparring" that continues throughout the play.

Constance has a unique philosophy, both for 1927 and now, Wondra said. Although Constance never challenges John about the affair, she decides to take a job with a friend as an interior decorator and save money so she can gain more of an equal footing in the marriage.

She encourages her best friend's husband to take his wife and go on a cruise around the 10-year high school reunion. And this is where the movie turns serious. It seems Lulu's real husband, Ray Sinclair, has just recently been released from prison. From here on the movie heads toward tragedy. And from here on "Something Wild" is a different movie.

The change in moods is jarring. First the movie is a wild and hilarious comedy, propelled forward by the primal rock 'n' roll classic "Wild Thing," and then the movie becomes violent, as Ray kidnaps Charlie and Lulu and robs a grocery store.

A case might be made that the wild behavior of the movie's first half ultimately leads to the tragedy of the movie's second half, but there's little in the movie that sets up this shift in tone.

"Something Wild" is worth seeing for the performances of Daniels and Griffith (as well as the brilliant debut performance by Ray Liotta as Lulu's husband), but the excellent performances can't completely overcome the abrupt twists in the movie's later half.

Swine Day sessions include studies on marketing hogs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers, meeting at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome for Swine Day, were welcomed Thursday morning by University President Jon Wefald.

Wefald encouraged producers to work together with K-State so that agriculture can flourish in Kansas.

"We had a good crowd this year and a good program," said Gary Allee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

He said approximately 400 people attended Swine Day and visited the Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show.

Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Robert Hines, professor of animal sciences and industry, discussed production aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

As weight increases, feed requirements increase and average daily gain decreases, causing hogs to become fatter, Hines said. Also, heavier hogs require more feeding floor space.

During the seminar sessions, Allee discussed the economic aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

Producers need to figure facility costs, rate-of-gain costs and feed efficiency costs needed to produce heavier hogs, Allee said.

"After this is done, a decision can be made whether or not to produce heavy (260-280 lbs.) hogs or average-weight (210-240 lbs.) hogs," he said.

Lean-value marketing programs were discussed by Paul Maxson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

The programs focus attention on providing pork producers with an economic incentive to raise lean, meaty hogs.

Most producers market hogs on a live-weight basis. The lean value program starts with the carcass. Producers receive payment based on the grade and yield of the carcass, Maxson said.

Jim Nelssen, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, explained a complex, high-nutrient density diet for baby pigs.

"Young pigs can utilize fat quite efficiently," Nelssen said. Starter diets normally don't include a large amount of fat.

"A producer can double his money by getting young pigs off to a better start," Nelssen said.

The pork producers also received an update report concerning K-State research on a variety of topics, followed by an open house of the K-State Swine Research Center.

Rangers vie for 8-man competition in future ROTC challenge contest

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's ROTC Rangers are preparing for what could be called the "Superstars" competition of the ROTC.

In preparation for the Ranger Challenge Competition, a training session will be at 7 a.m. Saturday at Fort Riley.

K-State has 20 Rangers who will be vying to become members of the eight-man squad with one alternate member. This team will compete statewide and possibly nationally, said Steve Hood, Ranger commander and senior in secondary education.

All universities with ROTC units in this region must have a team, and these teams will compete to find out who has the best Ranger Platoon, Hood said.

The competition will include a 10-kilometer fighting road march, which is a combination of running and walking; a hand-grenade assault course; weapons assembly; land navigation; building a one-rope bridge; marksmanship; and knot-tieing competitions, said Captain Douglas Booker, associate professor of military science.

Anyone enrolled in Army or Air Force ROTC who can accomplish a set of tasks, including tests of physical and mental strength, can become a Ranger, said Mike Kupsch, platoon sergeant and junior in political science.

The fitness competition includes swimming 15 meters in fatigues with a rifle and other minor equipment, Kupsch said.

"The Rangers is not for everyone," he said. "We are looking for people that like to challenge themselves, those that have a little bit more push than the average ROTC person."

"When I joined ROTC, I wanted something more challenging and that's what being a Ranger means," said Kupsch, a former Green Beret.

"In the regular Army, there are Rangers who are the sneak-and-peak, light guys," Booker said. "They are, in a sense, the elite; they would be the first to go into combat.

"K-State's Rangers are a smaller mirror image of the regular Army. They just do Ranger-type training, which is a little bit more than everyone else (in ROTC)."

Hood plans to compete and said the team has a "lead" on the other schools because K-State's Ranger program was well established before the platoon became involved in the Ranger Challenge Competition.

K-State's Rangers have a year to prepare for the final competition, which Booker said will be next March.

ASK lobbies for student interests

By The Collegian Staff

Although Associated Students of Kansas no longer lobbies for the deregulation of marijuana like it did in the early '70s, its purpose has remained the same — representing student issues to the state legislature, said Patty Hipsher, campus director of ASK.

Hipsher, senior in political science, spoke Thursday in the Union Courtyard as part of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas series, "Let's Talk About It."

ASK has two functions: to represent faculty evaluations.

ASK wants to increase student salaries on campus by 8 percent based on merit and longevity. This is to reward students who have worked at the same job for several years and who still receive minimum wage, Hipsher said.

The Policy and Projects Committee of ASK will vote and prioritize issues they want to concentrate on during their next legislative session.

After a policy change in February, Hipsher said campus representatives can now lobby for issues pertinent to individual colleges and universities.

Last session, representatives of the University of Kansas concentrated on outdoor lighting, while K-State targeted its efforts on handicapped accessibility to buildings and funding for Farrell Library, she said.

Swine Day sessions include studies on marketing hogs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers, meeting at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome for Swine Day, were welcomed Thursday morning by University President Jon Wefald.

Wefald encouraged producers to work together with K-State so that agriculture can flourish in Kansas.

"We had a good crowd this year and a good program," said Gary Allee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

He said approximately 400 people attended Swine Day and visited the Kansas Pork Congress Trade Show.

Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Robert Hines, professor of animal sciences and industry, discussed production aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

As weight increases, feed requirements increase and average daily gain decreases, causing hogs to become fatter, Hines said. Also, heavier hogs require more feeding floor space.

During the seminar sessions, Allee discussed the economic aspects of marketing hogs at heavier weights.

Producers need to figure facility costs, rate-of-gain costs and feed efficiency costs needed to produce heavier hogs, Allee said.

"After this is done, a decision can be made whether or not to produce heavy (260-280 lbs.) hogs or average-weight (210-240 lbs.) hogs," he said.

Lean-value marketing programs were discussed by Paul Maxson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

The programs focus attention on providing pork producers with an economic incentive to raise lean, meaty hogs.

Most producers market hogs on a live-weight basis. The lean value program starts with the carcass. Producers receive payment based on the grade and yield of the carcass, Maxson said.

Jim Nelssen, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, explained a complex, high-nutrient density diet for baby pigs.

"Young pigs can utilize fat quite efficiently," Nelssen said. Starter diets normally don't include a large amount of fat.

"A producer can double his money by getting young pigs off to a better start," Nelssen said.

The pork producers also received an update report concerning K-State research on a variety of topics, followed by an open house of the K-State Swine Research Center.

Speaker says communication, respect vital in farm operation

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The family farm is a team effort, and every member has to have a chance to contribute to the farm operation, said Ron Hanson, professor of agricultural economics at the University of Nebraska.

Hanson, the featured speaker during Swine Day Thursday at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome, addressed the issue of avoiding mistakes and stress that lead to family farm conflicts. Swine Day was sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Agricultural Experiment Station.

Every member of the family must be a part of the operation, have a say in the operation and feel important, Hanson said.

"If there is one clog in the wheel — one person that will not let the operation work — the family farm will die," he said.

Hanson, who has been working with farm families for nine years, said he has never charged a dollar for his counseling.

Hanson said there are four aspects critical for a family farm.

Family communications are important, Hanson said, adding that the inability to communicate as a family will cause family breakups.

Mutual respect between family members and a willingness to listen are two needs Hanson cited for effective communications.

"When communication stops in a family, watch how quickly the problems set in," Hanson said.

The second aspect critical to the family farm is that of the different lifestyles of the parents and the children.

"The farm must be operated as a business," he said. "Personal lives and jealousies must be kept out of the business.

Recognition that a farm wife receives from her husband is cited as the third aspect critical to the family farm. A wife plays a major role in a family farm, and it is important for the wife to be recognized, Hanson said.

"The true test of a farm marriage for the wife is sorting livestock with your husband," he said. "If (the wife) can survive that, then you have a strong marriage."

The fourth aspect, Hanson said, is favoritism among the children. He said this can be the most bitter of all feelings and can split families.

To correct this problem, Hanson suggested getting all of the children together, excluding any in-laws. The family must sit down, talk about what is going on within the family and the farm, and get all feelings out in the open, Hanson said.

Rangers vie for 8-man competition in future ROTC challenge contest

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's ROTC Rangers are preparing for what could be called the "Superstars" competition of the ROTC.

In preparation for the Ranger Challenge Competition, a training session will be at 7 a.m. Saturday at Fort Riley.

K-State has 20 Rangers who will be vying to become members of the eight-man squad with one alternate member. This team will compete statewide and possibly nationally, said Steve Hood, Ranger commander and senior in secondary education.

All universities with ROTC units in this region must have a team, and these teams will compete to find out who has the best Ranger Platoon, Hood said.

The competition will include a 10-kilometer fighting road march, which is a combination of running and walking; a hand-grenade assault course; weapons assembly; land navigation; building a one-rope bridge; marksmanship; and knot-tieing competitions, said Captain Douglas Booker, associate professor of military science.

Anyone enrolled in Army or Air Force ROTC who can accomplish a set of tasks, including tests of physical and mental strength, can become a Ranger, said Mike Kupsch, platoon sergeant and junior in political science.

ASK lobbies for student interests

By The Collegian Staff

Although Associated Students of Kansas no longer lobbies for the deregulation of marijuana like it did in the early '70s, its purpose has remained the same — representing student issues to the state legislature, said Patty Hipsher, campus director of ASK.

Hipsher, senior in political science, spoke Thursday in the Union Courtyard as part of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas series, "Let's Talk About It."

ASK has two functions: to represent the students to the state legislature, school administrators, the Board of Regents and others and to educate the students about issues that affect them, said Hipsher.

Phasing in the new drinking age and allowing underaged students to work in bars and clubs are two recent issues ASK supported, Hipsher said.

Although the new legislative session for ASK has not begun and its course is not set, ASK representatives have several issues in mind, Hipsher said.

An 8-percent increase in salaries for professors in Regents schools and a 1-percent increase in retirement benefits are under consideration for the next session, which runs from the middle of January to May 1987, she said. Also, ASK is pushing for merit pay for teachers through mandatory faculty evaluations.

ASK wants to increase student salaries on campus by 8 percent based on merit and longevity. This is to reward students who have worked at the same job for several years and who still receive minimum wage, Hipsher said.

The Policy and Projects Committee of ASK will vote and prioritize issues they want to concentrate on during their next legislative session.

Downtown Manhattan to undergo renovation

By The Collegian Staff

In working toward the goal of instilling pride in the city's downtown business district and developing the area to compliment Manhattan Town Center mall, the Manhattan Main Street committee met at The Cotton Club Thursday night to review its actions.

"The Manhattan Main Street project was evaluated by the National Main Street Team and was given extremely high marks in all aspects of the project," said Richard Burke, board chairman.

Manhattan is one of five Kansas cities designated as a National Main Street City. Membership allows the city to receive training and technical assistance for downtown redevelopment from the organization's offices in Washington, D.C.

Locally, the project was developed to improve Manhattan's downtown area while retaining the tradition and pride of the central business district.

The central business district is undergoing a renovation of public sidewalks and other facilities in a project titled "Downtown Streetscape." The project also provides for the planting of trees and installation of street lights, benches, drinking fountains and other street furnishings.

Several individuals attending the meeting said they believed the project is a "confidence builder" for the area by developing a sense of unity in the downtown business community.

Project manager Brenda Spencer discussed the organization's four-point approach toward revitalizing the downtown area. The points were organization, promotion, design and economic restructuring.

Past events sponsored by Main Street to promote downtown Manhattan have included sales promotions, Easter egg hunts, fashion shows and KSU Appreciation Days.

Cyclones to face 'Cats with new head coach

File/Andy Nelson

Linebacker Dennis Gibson (center) was Iowa State University's Most Valuable Player on defense last season and will be one of the major obstacles the Wildcats will need to overcome in their matchup against Iowa State. The Cyclones' defense is ranked fourth in the Big Eight.

K-State's dreams of winning rest upon play of secondary

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

It has been more than 14 quarters of football since a Wildcat player has set foot in the end zone, and head coach Stan Parrish knows his club must break that string if it hopes to compete with an explosive Iowa State squad Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

Parrish said his team, 2-7 on the year and 1-4 in the Big Eight Conference, must come up with some big plays and execute better on offense in order to stay in Saturday's contest.

"They (the Cyclones) are a pressuring type of defense, and we're going to try and create some big plays. We'd like to get two or three big plays in the ball game," he said. "We don't have great depth, so there aren't a lot of personnel changes we can make with our club. We've just got to do a better job of doing things."

Parrish did say that he has installed a few "wrinkles" in the offense, but he would not tip his hand as to what those might be.

The 'Cats, however, will not find the going easy on offense. Iowa State's defense is ranked 8th nationally in pass defense and 31st overall.

The Cyclones, 5-4 on the year and 2-3 in the Big Eight, have had problems of their own as of late. Head coach Jim Criner was fired earlier in the week after the NCAA uncovered some alleged improprieties in Iowa State's football program. Criner has been replaced by former assistant head coach Chuck Banker.

Parrish said he does not expect the coaching change to have a significant impact on the game's outcome.

"It probably won't," he said. "Maybe not this week, maybe next week. It will when they've had a little time to digest what's going on."

While Parrish said he is unconcerned with who is at the Cyclones' helm, he is worried about stopping Iowa State's high-powered passing game, led by senior quarterback Alex Espinoza. Espinoza is the conference leader in passing yardage and has been voted Big Eight Offensive Player of the Week twice this season.

"I think he's the best pure thrower in the league," Parrish said.

Parrish said the Wildcats must mix up their defensive schemes and keep Espinoza off balance if they hope to keep the Cyclones' passing game in check.

"You have to put some pressure on him and yet get into coverage, try to keep him as confused as possible," he said. "And that's not easy because he's played so much. And then, we have to hope he's not real hot. He's a streak player, and boy, when he's hot, he's hot. And sometimes when he's not, he's not."

The Cyclones are averaging 186 yards a game through the air, and the young Wildcat secondary will not have the luxury of concentrating on just one receiver. Espinoza likes to spread the ball around, as is witnessed by the fact that Iowa State claims six of the top 18 receiving spots statistically in the conference.

Parrish said he is pleased with his team's attitude despite the recent offensive troubles and despite being in the throes of a three-game losing streak.

"I think we're in as good a frame of mind as you can possibly be," he said of his players. "I think they've worked hard. I think they are dedicated to playing hard and doing their level best. And I'd be disappointed if we didn't play just as hard these last two weeks."

Parrish said that with the Nebraskas and Oklahomas safely behind him for the year, the remaining games take on added importance.

"When you think you've got a shot at winning it, there's a significance there," he said. "We hope we've got a shot at the last two (games)."

'Cats, U.S. team to play Saturday

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

It will be a battered group that new head basketball coach Lon Kruger will bring into K-State's exhibition game against the U.S. Armed Services All-Star team Saturday night at 7:30 in Ahearn Field House.

"We're down to seven scholarship players that will suit up Saturday night, which is a big, big concern of course," Kruger said. "We're talking about wanting to do some things in regards to tempo, and all of a sudden, we simply don't have the bodies."

Sidelined with various ailments are seniors Ron Meyer and Percy Eddie, junior Michael McCraeven and freshman Howard Bonser. Sophomore Norris Coleman has been declared ineligible to compete by the National Collegiate Athletic Association and will be unable to play, as well.

Kruger said he expects his remaining healthy troops to be tested by the armed services squad.

"I know they're an experienced group, they've played a lot of ball games together," he said. "They've got good maturity, good strength, big people inside and real good experience in the backcourt. I've seen them play and I know they're capable of being awfully good."

Kruger said that by playing the exhibition, he hopes to get a better picture of where his squad stands as the season opener draws near.

"Even though we're not ready to play a ball game," he said, "it will give us a pretty clear-cut idea of what things we need to work on additionally and some things maybe that we are doing pretty well. It's a good opportunity to evaluate where we're at, evaluate individuals, and of course, it's a good opportunity for some of the players to gain some experience.

"We'd like to start developing a personality in so far as how this team will play and what their personality on the floor will be. And this game gives us a chance to maybe take the first step, and again, to see what areas we need to polish up and what ares we're pleased with."

Kruger said his players, meanwhile, are looking forward to a breather from the regular practice regimen.

"This is a good break for them, anything to do something other than practice at this point," he said. "They're really looking forward to it."

Admission to the men's game will be $2 for adults and $1 for students without season tickets. Students with season tickets will be admitted free.

The Lady Cats' basketball squad will conduct an intrasquad scrimmage at 10 a.m. Saturday in Ahearn. Admission will be free.

The men kick off the season Nov. 29 at Ahearn against South Dakota University. The women open Nov. 28 when they will be the host team for the McCall Pattern Classic.

K-State ready for regional competition

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

When K-State's cross country teams run in the District Five meet Saturday in Peoria, Ill., the men's and women's squads will be confronted by the usual "teams to beat" — several Big Eight Conference opponents.

All the Big Eight squads plus the Missouri Valley Conference teams will comprise the district setup, which is being hosted by Bradley University and will be at Newman Golf Course. Meeting the conference foes (five of which are ranked in the top 20 nationally in the women's division) each week is almost enough to make Wildcat Coach John Capriotti prematurely gray.

"All the Big Eight teams will be there, which means it will be a dog fight," Capriotti said. "We are all butting heads every week, but that is what competition is all about."

The top three teams in each division, plus the top three individuals of the top 15 overall runners not on teams that qualify, advance to the National Collegiate Athletic Association national meet Nov. 24 in Tuscon, Ariz.

With the strong Big Eight field, the district meet could turn out to be a re-enactment of the Big Eight meet held two weeks ago in Manhattan. Capriotti, however, said he believes the larger field will be an advantage to his women's squad, who narrowly lost to Oklahoma State in the conference championships but still moved from the No. 8 to No. 6 national ranking.

"(The larger field) is an advantage to us because it puts Oklahoma State's fifth girl farther back," Capriotti said of the Cowgirls' first-, third-, fourth-, 10th- and 33rd-place finishes in the Big Eight meet. "They beat us up front a little more than I thought they would."

While K-State would dearly love to come back with the District Five championship trophy, Capriotti said the top concern is for the team to qualify for the nationals. Last season, the women beat out Nebraska by one point in the district meet after finishing 25 points behind the Cornhuskers in the Big Eight meet to finish third.

"We need a nice, solid team race," Capriotti said before departing for Peoria on Thursday evening. "We would like to win. But if it comes right down to it, our goal is just to qualify.

"It will be an extremely tight race — I'm scared. No team can afford to lose a runner in the women's race because the teams are just too evenly matched. If we don't run a good one, we might not be going anywhere."

In the women's race, K-State will be fielding mostly the same team that lined up with two weeks ago at Warner Park. Jacque Struckhoff, Chris Vanatta, Alysun Deckert, Anneli Edling, Angie Barry, Betsy Silzer and Lisa Wakem will run. Wakem is replacing Nancy Hoffman.

Vanatta, who placed second in the Big Eight championship's is expected to lead the team again Saturday.

"I think Chris should be battling with (Veronica) Haberl and (Christine) McMiken for the top spot," Capriotti said of the Oklahoma State duo. "I expect a few good races out of our other runners, too."

A new face, Edling, came through with a surprising ninth-place overall finish to place second on the team at the conference meet.

"That is where she should be running," Capriotti said of Edling, a freshman from Sweden. "She is a talented little girl. She can even run better than that, she is a tough cookie.

The men will be bolstered with the return of All-American hopeful Ron Stahl. Stahl, who missed the Big Eight meet after leaving the team, was re-admitted to the squad last week.

"I think Ron has learned a big lesson," Capriotti said. "That was the hardest thing in my coaching career not to let Ron run. I think it will pay big dividends in the future. It is over now and forgotten. Ron will be a better runner for it.

"He is hungry. No doubt about it, Ron is hungry after missing the Big Eight meet."

Capriotti said the Wildcat men have an "outside shot" at qualifying for the national meet if they run a great race. Stahl, he said, has an excellent chance to win the race or at least qualify for the nationals individually.

For the first time this season, K-State will be fielding its No. 1 lineup in a men's race. Stahl, Jim Knudsen, Pat Hessini, Rob Hays, David Warders, Jan Jonsson and David Keller are all expected to participate.

"This will be the first time we have ever had this line-up," Capriotti said. "They could do it if they have a good race, but it will take one heck of an effort. We will surprise some people this weekend."

Moody qualifies for academic squad

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Senior running back Todd Moody made the 26-member Academic All-Big Eight Football Team, while six other K-State football players were named to the 14-member, honorable-mention academic list.

Moody, who carried a 3.63 grade-point average in electrical engineering, was listed a first-team offensive back along with Nebraska's Ken Kaelin, Oklahoma's Earl Johnson and Mark Henderson from the University of Kansas.

Wildcats named to the honorable mention list were senior punter Troy Faunce (management/marketing), sophomore wide receiver Mark Wentzel (engineering), senior offensive guard Bob Bessert (animal science and industry), junior wide receiver Todd Elder (business administration), junior cornerback Brad Lambert (engineering) and junior offensive guard Matt Garver (pre-veterinary medicine).

"These kids were recruited by the previous coaching staff and I think it's just an indication that they brought in some kids here who had goals and academically wanted to get some things done," K-State Coach Stan Parrish said.

"I think we've continued along on that process and maybe even emphasized it more. But I think the kids deserve the credit for that and that is where it should go," he said.

There are nine repeaters from last year's team in addition to Kansas fullback Henderson, who made the squad in 1984. Repeaters are Brian Bosworth, David Vickers and Anthony Phillips of Oklahoma; Robb Schnitzler and Dale Klein of Nebraska; Barry Helton and Eric McCarty of Colorado; and Kevin Harder and Wayne Ziegler of Kansas.

Only three members of the 1986 conference academic team posted grade point averages below 3.0 on a 4.0 scale. The average GPA of the first team, which includes 18 seniors, two graduate students, five juniors and one sophomore, is 3.33.

First-Team Offense

Ends: Robb Schnitzler, senior, Nebraska, 3.46, pre-physical therapy; Keith Jackson, junior, Oklahoma, 2.8, communications.

Linemen: Rob Maggard, senior, Nebraska, 3.71, speech communications; Tom Welter, senior, Nebraska, 3.48, business administation; Anthony Phillips, sophomore, Oklahoma, 3.31, management; Phil Pettey, senior, Missouri, 2.88, secondary education; Troy Wilkins, senior, Oklahoma State, 3.06, sociology; Travis Simpson, senior, Oklahoma, 3.04, communications.

Backs: Todd Moody, senior, K-State, 3.63, electrical engineering; Ken Kaelin, senior, Nebraska, 3.03 , recreation management; Earl Johnson, senior, Oklahoma, 3.3, communications; Mark Henderson, senior, Kansas, 4.0, business administration.

Kicker: Dale Klein, senior, Nebraska, 3.74, mechanical engineering.

First-Team Defense

Ends: Brad Tyrer, graduate, Nebraska, 3.06, speech communication; Mike Mantle, senior, Oklahoma, 3.0, management.

Kruger signs 6-4 guard as next year's 1st pick

By The Collegian Staff

Carlos Diggins, a forward-guard at Butler County Community College, has signed a letter of intent to play basketball at K-State.

The 6-foot-4, 200-pound Diggins averaged 18 points, two steals and three assists a game last year. The South Bend, Ind., native was an all-conference selection last season.

The Sporting News has ranked Diggins as one of the top 10 junior college players available this year. Diggens declined signing with Oklahoma and Michigan in favor of coming to K-State.

Diggens is the first player Coach Lon Kruger has signed for next season. Kruger said he isn't expecting to sign any other players during the early signing period, which ends Wednesday.

Craig Upchurch, a 6-foot-7 forward from Beaumont High School in St. Louis, is rumored to be interested in signing with K-State. Upchurch made a campus visit to the University last week.

Richard Nixon because he has no distinguishing features, O'Shea said.

"I think he set out to be a social satirist," O'Shea said.

In 1969, Feiffer covered the Chicago Seven Conspiracy Trial. The trial addressed incidents occurring at the 1968 Democratic Convention. Feiffer caught actual happenings of the trial on paper.

One cartoon shows the defendant gagged and bound to his chair to prevent him from speaking and gesturing out of order in the courtroom.

Another cartoon portrays a woman who sang in response to the questions asked of her on the stand. The judge ordered someone to shut her mouth — a man in the courtroom did.

Robert Daly, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, spoke about Feiffer's background and the background of political cartoons in the United States.

Cartooning is indigenous to America, Daly said.

Editorial and political cartoons involve a "language of exaggeration and caricatures of people," Daly said.

Political cartoons tend to be drawn in a single box, whereas comics are a series of boxes. Sometimes political cartoonists divide the one box into several.

"We have roughly 200 editorial cartoonists (in the nation)," Daly said.

Harold Nichols, professor of speech, ended the presentation with his observations of Feiffer's writing style.

Feiffer's play, "The White House Murder Case," illustrates his writing technique, Nichols said. The characters are not deep and the scenes are not long, which is similar to cartoons, he said. The play deals with the media and the government's manipulation of it.

level of controversy ensuing them," she said.

Traeger said she wasn't telling task force members that they had to do what she was suggesting.

"I could effectively put some legislation on the floor (of Senate) to that effect," she said.

The legislation would amend the task force charter, she said.

"Then they would have a definite voice of direction, and that voice would be Student Senate."

Traeger said she wanted the task force to "exhaust every resource," but did not want it to "be counterproductive to the objectives of its charge."

She said she wanted the group to be comfortable with the information they were gathering, but "not to the point where they feel they have to be the expert."

"I don't know if that's really possible unless we actually hire an outside firm or someone to do these types of studies," she said.

While she doesn't want to rush the task force, Traeger said Senate does have the right to call for a recommendation at any time.

"To use that power now would be terribly unwise," she said. "But if we get to the point where we see that this is getting dragged on and on so as not to bring it to the students, we'll have to step in."

Traeger said that although there are some task force members who feel "there are miles and miles yet to cover," she believes the majority are "starting to get a good feel for where they should start winding down."

"Yes, we could research this until we're blue in the face," she said, "but I'm not condoning that."

On the other hand, Traeger said, she does not want the issue to come to referendum before the task force is ready.

"I think it could be very embarassing, after all the publicity given to this, if we come out when we're not ready," she said.

Delayed line schedules attributed to problems in production process

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State Printing Service has claimed responsibility for the delay in students receiving line schedules.

"We're charged with getting it (the line schedule) out on time and we didn't make it. We'll take the blame," said Ralph Koppes, temporary director of K-State Printing Service.

The line schedules were to be printed by Oct. 31 and available for disbursement Nov. 5, said Don Foster, University registrar.

Cy Wainscott, director of public relations and communications for the University, said three major reasons caused the delay in printing the line schedules.

—The Printing Service had a computer failure, so the procedures section of the line schedule had to be reset.

—The paper supplier was late delivering the paper on which the line schedules were to be printed.

—Official production flow arrived from the Office of Registrar to the Printing Service all at once instead of in stages as it generally does.

Foster said the computer printout, which comes from his office and is used by the Printing Service to make the line schedule, was of poor quality. The computer printing ribbon was old and did not print clearly.

The Printing Service uses a printing process that involves taking pictures of what is to be printed and making plates of it. The poor quality of the computer printout caused the Printing Service to have to take several pictures in order to make a suitable plate for printing.

The computer printout could have been rerun, but it would have taken 8 to 10 hours, Foster said. Re-running the printout might have saved money and time, but he was not notified of the trouble, he said.

"I don't think it would have saved time (re-running the printout). It would be a close trade off," Koppes said.

By the time the Printing Service would have sent the printout back to the registrar's office and received it again, it could have caused a longer delay in the production of the line schedules, Koppes said.

The line schedule, which comes out for the spring semester during the fall semester, has a tight deadline, Foster said. Preregistration cannot occur during dead week, so all deadlines for line schedules work forward from that date. Teachers give class information to the registrar's office around the first of September. The registrar's office has about six weeks to compile the information. This leaves about two weeks for printing the line schedule and two weeks for disbursement prior to preregistration, Foster said.

Because of the delay, line schedules were not delivered until Nov. 11.

Reagan

the news reports will have the effect of foreclosing the possibility of further relations.

"I don't think they have," he replied, "and yet I think that to be sustained, there's got to be some real risks overcome within Iran and I think it's a very uncertain future...That, we can best help by quite a lot of discretion and seriousness on our side."

Arms shipments had been cut off by then-President Jimmy Carter after radicals seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and took dozens of Americans hostage.

Reagan said it was "utterly false" that the weapons shipments to Iran, at a time when the United States had imposed an embargo on such deliveries, were intended to ransom the Americans held hostage in Lebanon. Nor, he said, had the United States "undercut its allies and secretly violated American policy against trafficking with terrorists."

"We did not — repeat — did not trade weapons or anything else for hostages," Reagan said. "Nor will we...We have not, nor will we, capitulate to terrorists."

In another passage, he said, "The United States has not made concessions to those who hold our people captive in Lebanon — and we will not."

Rather, Reagan said, his "secret diplomatic initiative" was recognition of the value of reestablishing "some degree of access and influence" with Iran. He said Iran's geographical location, near the Soviet Union, and its rich oil reserves give the Islamic nation key significance to the United States.

Reports of the administration's dealings with Iran accelerated earlier this month, when David Jacobsen, one of the Americans held hostage in Lebanon, was released. Earlier this year, the Rev. Benjamin Weir and the Rev. Lawrence Martin Jenco, who also had been held in captivity, were released.

Two other Americans, Associated Press Middle East correspondent Terry Anderson and Thomas Sutherland, dean of agriculture at the American University in Beirut, are still being held by the pro-Iranian Islamic Jihad in Lebanon.

In authorizing the transfer of what he called "small amounts of defensive weapons and spare parts for defensive systems to Iran," Reagan said he was trying "to convince Tehran that our negotiators were acting with my authority."

The president went on to say that "the most significant step which Iran could take...would be to use its influence in Lebanon to secure the release of all hostages held there."

"Some progress has already been made," Reagan said. "Since U.S. government contact began with Iran, there has been no evidence of Iranian government complicity in acts of terrorism against the United States. Hostages have come home, and we welcome the efforts that the government of Iran has taken in the past and is currently undertaking."

In advance of Reagan's speech, congressional Democrats continued to criticize the administration's dealings with Tehran, calling for investigative hearings into the secret contacts.

They said an arms-for-hostages swap would represent a precedent that must be reversed.

Earlier in the day, the State Department said that the United States and Iran are nearing agreement on the return of about $500 million in Iranian funds held by the Federal Reserve Bank since 1981.

At the same time, they rejected the notion — suggested by Iran's ambassador to the United Nations — that there might be a connection between settlement of the funds issue and Iranian help to free American hostages held in Lebanon.

Merchants Association had told the SGA that the fund-raiser would be an admission of guilt and could result in a lawsuit, Traeger said.

"But that's not the case at all," she said. "Before we started this, we really had to check that out."

Traeger said the money raised would be "a token of our sympathy for her (Robare's) situation."

The money will be given to the First Christian Church to present to Robare, Traeger said.

"I don't think we're necessarily looking for a lot of gratification from doing this. We just very honestly feel terrible about it.

"None of us were down there rocking that car," Traeger said, "and we've got pictures to prove that. But we still feel like she's a member of the community, and so are we, and that's what it's all about."

Robare was admitted to Memorial Hospital in Topeka last week, Duerfeldt said.

Hospital officials would neither confirm nor deny her admittance.

Duerfeldt said there have been "a lot of marvelous responses from the community on Robare's behalf." Contributions have come from "all over" the community.

"We've had three gifts of $100 each from individuals, and anything from $1 up," he said.

In addition, Duerfeldt said, he has received five offers for cars to replace Robare's Volkswagen.

other possible solutions. Alternative solutions being considered by Johnson include changing the game date to later in the fall when the weather might be too cold for students to congregate outside. Another suggestion was the changing of game day to Sunday when alcoholic beverages could not be served.

"However, it may be too late by now to do any rescheduling," Johnson said.

In other business, Senate amended and approved a bill allocating $421 to the Kansas State Chapter of the American Institute of Architecture Students to attend a national forum. The chapter originally asked for $551, but Senate denied $130 requested for registration fees.

Senate also passed a bill which states that Senate opposes state mandatory drug testing of any student or faculty member. The bill will now be presented to the Board of Regents, University President Jon Wefald, Governor-elect Mike Hayden and members of the Kansas Legislature.

Seminar series provides advice to professionals

By The Collegian Staff

Area professionals and work force members are able to receive instruction without attending formal classes through a development series sponsored by the K-State Division of Continuing Education and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

The fifth annual Professional Development Seminar Series began Wednesday morning at the Manhattan Country Club with about 80 people attending. The opening lecture of the series featured David Danskin from the University Counseling Center with a presentation on stress management techniques.

The seminar series involves a variety of presentations each month as a service to the professional community in the Manhattan area. The current series is to continue until April, with meetings on the second Wednesday of each month, said Larry Pankratz, continuing education specialist for business and engineering and coordinator for the program.

"Our focus is of a community education program to help people in the work force," Pankratz said.

"It originally started as a program for women, but there was so much interest from everyone we decided to open it up to anyone in the working community," he said. "This is the first year we've gone to a cosponsorship with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce. We thought it would be more appropriate to deal with the businesses."

The cost for participants is $15 per session, or $75 for all six sessions. He said group rates also are available.

"The program is fee supported," Pankratz said. "If we don't make enough money, we can't run the program.

"That's why evaluations are important. We receive evaluations from participants and make changes to meet their needs.

"(The Division of Continuing Education) is more of a liaison between the community and the University. We provide a lot of things for the community that they wouldn't normally get unless they take classes (at the University)."

SGA schedules events to promote awareness

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

In an effort to receive ideas from students and increase awareness of what student government does, the Student Governing Association is sponsoring SGA Week Monday through Thursday.

The focus of the first three days is for SGA representatives to meet with living groups, residence halls and off-campus students to discover problems students may have pertaining to the campus. This time also is to be used to allow SGA representatives to inform students of activities the association has available.

Several events have been planned for SGA Day on Thursday, including a question-and-answer session concerning the possibility of an athletic fee.

Athletic Director Larry Travis and members of the athletic fee task force will be present at the session.

"We are going to make available the people who have the information and can answer the questions precisely," said Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, senior in marketing. "SGA officials will be there to try and clarify for the students what Senate will do in any scenario."

Another issue scheduled for discussion concerns problems occurring in Aggieville following recent K-State-University of Kansas football games.

Traeger said Aggieville merchants and Senate are interested in student input about solutions to past problems.

Traeger said a session will be held to try and explain issues that Senate is discussing.

"We are currently looking at changing the elections from February to November, and this will be decided by Senate (next Thursday) on whether it should be put to a student referendum," she said.

Traeger said a morning and afternoon workshop will be conducted to explain the process of running for Senate.

"We want to clear up misconceptions about the election process," she said. "People think they do not have a chance (to win), so they do not run."

Tuesday's activities are to include senators from their respective colleges meeting in various Union rooms to discuss SGA, their particular college and answer questions. Traeger said this is a way off-campus students can provide input.

Iranians don't need signs of good faith, Shultz says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George Shultz said Sunday the United States should make no more arms shipments to Iran, contending he doesn't see any need for "further signals" of U.S. good faith to moderate Iranians.

Meanwhile, John Poindexter, President Reagan's national security adviser, said the U.S. arms embargo against Iran still stands and said he remains optimistic that more hostages may be released by pro-Iranian forces in Lebanon.

But Robert McFarlane, former national security adviser who made at least one secret trip to Iran, said his contacts among moderate Iranians are in danger of being killed now that his efforts have been made public.

Senate Democratic leader Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.V., urged the administration to state publicly that there would be no more arms shipments to Iran "or any other terrorist state." A congressional investigation into administration dealings with Iran, which Reagan denies were direct negotiations for the release of hostages, is to begin this week.

President Reagan, returning to the White House from Camp David, brushed aside a reporter's question as to whether he had stopped arms shipments to Iran, saying, "I told you the truth once." The president did not pause as he escorted Nancy Reagan into the White House.

Shultz, interviewed on CBS' "Face the Nation," did not specifically criticize past arms shipments but said Reagan's decision to send a signal to Iran with an arms shipment was a subject for debate.

"When you get elected president, that's one of the things you get the right to do, to make decisions of that kind," Shultz said. He declined to say what advice he gave Reagan on the shipments.

Asked if more arms would be sent, he said, "It's certainly against our policy, and I think the signal has been given ... As far as I'm concerned, I don't see any need for further signals."

Pressed further on whether more arms will be sent, Shultz said, "Under the circumstances of Iran's war with Iraq, its pursuit of terrorism, its association with those

Ramada Inn changes to concern University

By The Collegian Staff

An announcement is expected to be made this afternoon regarding the change of ownership for the University Ramada Inn.

The University, KSU Foundation and representatives of the Atlanta-based William Reed Co. have announced a news conference for 1:30 p.m. at the Ramada Inn, 17th Street and Anderson Avenue.

University officials declined to make any further statement on the proceedings.

A statement released Friday by the Office of University Relations described the announcement would concern "major agreements of importance to the University and the economy of the community, region and state."

Previous discussion and announcements have stated that the new owner, the William Reed Co., probably will hire the Marriott Corp. to serve as management for the facility.

Among those scheduled to participate in the news conference are William Reed, Atlanta; George Miller, K-State vice president for administration and finance; and KSU Foundation President Art Loub.

Others to be present, according to University Relations, include Assistant Provost Laverne Lindsey; Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, and Jack Goldstein, Foundation executive committee chairman.

Judge refuses early release of Hasenfus

By The Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Justice Minister Rodrigo Reyes rejected on Sunday the possibility of pardoning American Eugene Hasenfus, who drew 30 years in prison for his part in a weapons delivery flight to U.S.-backed Contra rebels.

"There is no reason to pardon him," Reyes told The Associated Press by telephone one day after a political court handed down the verdict and the sentence. "The Nicaraguan penitentiary system will guarantee that he fulfills his sentence."

Earlier remarks by President Daniel Ortega had fed speculation that Hasenfus, 45, of Marinette, Wis., might eventually be pardoned.

Ortega has not commented on the case since the American mercenary was convicted and his stand on a possible pardon is not known.

Reyes, chief prosecutor in the case, said, "If a pardon is applicable, I am sure there will be a rejection by the population and the authorities would have to explain that step very well."

Pro-government newspapers on Sunday billed the verdict against Hasenfus as a conviction of the United States as well.

"The 30 years for Hasenfus are a penalty for Yankee interventionism," El Nuevo Diario said.

It quoted unidentified Nicaraguan legal authorities as saying "this sentence should hit the eardrums of President Reagan (who should) observe that his obstinate intention of destroying the revolution will have severe responses."

The government earlier rejected a Contra offer to swap 30 Sandinista prisoners for Workers remove asbestos from ceiling

Finances restrain further removals

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Asbestos was removed by local contractors from the first- and second-floor ceilings of Edwards Hall on Oct. 16 and 17, said H. Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent for the Department of Housing.

The asbestos was removed after a toilet overflow on the third floor soaked first- and second-floor bathroom ceilings and loosened asbestos materials in the ceiling. Wiley said the maintenance department received the report concerning the toilet overflow in Edwards on Oct. 14.

"We sent a plumbing supervisor to check on the report, and he found that the stool overflow was not a malfunction...the toilet had been packed full of toilet tissue as a result of someone not knowing how to use the toilet, or it had been done on purpose," Wiley said.

He said department personnel realized the ceilings contained asbestos, and although the asbestos was encapsulated (sealed with paint), it had the potential to flake when wet. Because of the potential hazard of asbestos particles being released into the air, the department decided to remove the asbestos.

Asbestos fibers in the air have been linked in scientific studies to certain types of cancer in humans. Wiley said encapsulated asbestos is not a health danger because it does not enter the air, and it does not become dangerous until it is scraped or begins to flake, causing the fibers to enter the air.

Bob Moody, public information officer at the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, said, "We try to eliminate the public's exposure to friable (loose, powdery) asbestos. We stress that the asbestos is removed or encapsulated."

Wiley said an additional concern was that the wet sheet rock composing the ceiling might fall and injure someone.

"Campus Safety Officer John Lambert (director of public safety) decided to lock up the bathrooms," Wiley said, adding that 18 residents live in the area of these bathrooms.

"I think the housing department did the best job they could," said Steve Woolf, director of Edwards. "They took care of the job in two to three days, and I thought it would take much longer. I was real happy that (the Department of) Housing got on it right away."

Wiley said the contractor told him, "It is more hazardous to stand at a stoplight at 17th (Street) and Anderson (Avenue)...than to stand in the bathrooms (that contain the wet asbestos)...because all car brakes have asbestos in them, and there is probably more asbestos in the air at that point."

All the asbestos has been removed from the bathrooms involved in this incident, Wiley said. However, asbestos complying with safety standards remains in other areas of campus residence halls.

"Most of our (residence hall) areas have been tested for asbestos and no areas have been found that are a hazardous threat," he said. "Air samples were taken, and asbestos in the air was not detected.

"There is not any area in any of the residence halls where students live that is hazardous to health because all the areas have been monitored and there have been no asbestos fibers detected."

The asbestos can be removed, if needed, as a maintenance operation by trained University employees if university and state rules are followed and if the area of asbestos is less than three square feet.

Four people on the maintenance staff of the housing department are certified to remove asbestos, Wiley said. Department personnel started removing small amounts of asbestos about 1½ years ago.

He said a local company, Asbestos Insulation Control, was contracted for Edwards because the amount of asbestos was larger than the department was authorized to remove.

"We are not going to remove asbestos unless something like this (incident in Edwards) happens...where the asbestos becomes...friable."

Wiley said most of the asbestos in the residence halls is not removed for financial reasons.

"Removing asbestos is very expensive," he said. "It cost $5,500 to

Filipinos incriminate Enrile during march

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines — Thousands of demonstrators marched through downtown Manila on Sunday denouncing Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile, and a labor official told them guns may be needed to protect democracy.

Nick Elman, an official of the leftist May 1st Movement labor union, also said the 500,000-member union would strike nationwide Thursday to coincide with the funeral of its slain leader, Rolando Olalia, a supporter of President Corazon Aquino.

The union, the Philippines' largest, has also called for a general strike for today in Manila.

"But it is not the workers alone but the whole population that must move, if necessary with guns, to defend democracy," Elman, the union's secretary for mass actions, told about 3,500 demonstrators.

The demonstrators chanted slogans accusing Enrile in last week's killing of Olalia. They shouted, "Mr. Enrile, Killer of Olalia!," "Redeem Military Blood Debts!" and "Welga, welga!," meaning "Strike, strike!" in Tagalog.

At a rally by about 15,000 people in downtown Manila on Sunday, Aquino said: "I want to be known as a leader of peace, but if there is no other choice, I am ready to lead a war."

Before his death, Olalia warned that his union would launch a general strike if the military attempted a coup. Rumors have been widespread that officers linked to Enrile planned to overthrow Aquino's government because of her peace overtures to communist rebels.

Radio reports Korean leader dead

SEOUL, South Korea — The Defense Ministry, in an broadcast today on state-run radio, said North Korean loudspeakers along the demilitarized zone were saying North Korean President Kim Il Sung had been killed in a shooting.

The same broadcast said there was no confirmation of the report from North Korean radio broadcasts or sources here in the capital of South Korea.

In Tokyo, Radio Press, a Japanese news agency that monitors communist bloc broadcasts, said North Korea's official Radio Pyongyang did not say anything about Kim or a shooting in its hourly newscast at 11 a.m. today (9 p.m. Sunday EST).

There was no explanation why communist North Korea would disclose the information through the loudspeakers along the demilitarized zone that divides the peninsula. They normally are used for propaganda broadcasts beamed to the south.

Lee Heung-shik, spokesman for the South Korean Defense Ministry, said in a brief announcement, "North Korean propaganda loudspeakers at the front line said on Sunday Kim Il Sung had been shot and killed."

He added that regular North Korean radio broadcasts monitored here had made no mention of such a happening, and that no confirmation had been received through other channels.

Lee said the South Korean military was on its usual alert, but gave no other details immediately.

Police officials announced that the entire national police force had been placed on full alert "in connection with the recent situation in North Korea and to block possible subversive attempts by impure elements."

Official sentenced for inhumanities

PEKING — A former local Communist Party official was sentenced to four years in prison on charges he illegally detained 72 villagers and tortured several because his bicycle bell was stolen, the party newspaper said Sunday.

Li Jiyin, 47, enraged over the theft of the bell in December 1984, had security officers of Hengshan village in Shanxi province question 85 people the next day, the People's Daily said.

The report said 72 of them were held illegally and several were tortured.

It said Yang Jishun, deputy head of village security, was sentenced to three years in prison.

The sentencing Saturday of Li and Yang came amid a campaign to vigorously prosecute officials who illegally detain citizens. The government earlier reported 949 cases of illegal detention nationwide in the first half of 1986.

Soviet emigres change destination

LONDON — A family of Soviet emigres left Sunday for the United States, their home for the past 10 years, after a six-day sojourn in their native land and a second change of heart.

David and Faina Gonta, their two teen-age sons and Gonta's mother boarded a British Airways flight at London's Heathrow Airport for the next leg of their trip from Jersey City, N.J., to Moscow and back to the United States.

The Gontas were homesick for their native Ukraine, so they sold their belongings to raise the airfare and arrived in Moscow last today.

But after four days in the Soviet capital with the teen-age boys missing their friends in school, the Gontas sought permission to emigrate again to the United States. They had retained their American passports, but still required Soviet exit visas.

The left Moscow Saturday for London, where they spent the night.

"I'm looking forward to getting back to America," Gonta said Sunday. "Moscow was nice and it would have been good to return to our home town in Moldavia in the Ukraine but it was obvious from the start that the boys were never going to adjust."

Students accused of lacing coffee

EUGENE, Ore. — Three high school students accused of spiking a teacher's coffee with LSD will be expelled if convicted or if they admit responsibility, their principal says.

South Eugene High School Principal Don Jackson said Saturday that he had never seen any incident as "hazardous or as ludicrous" as what the boys are alleged to have done.

Police arrested the boys after Lou Hammer, an industrial arts teacher at the school, became disoriented and was taken to a doctor Friday afternoon. A student told school officials that he heard LSD, a hallucinogenic drug, had been put in Hammer's coffee.

Jackson said Hammer takes medicine for high blood pressure, that his blood pressure shot up Friday because of the LSD, and that it "could have been a lethal situation."

The boys were charged with second-degree assault, unlawful possession of a controlled substance and furnishing a controlled substance.

Grammar hotline helps students

PENSACOLA, Fla. — Confounded by conjunctions, addled by apostrophes, or perplexed by punctuation? Help may be only a phone call away.

Many colleges and universities have started grammar hot lines, partly in response to increasing flexibility in the rules of grammar, usage and style.

"When I was in school, there was either right or wrong," said Mamie Webb Hixon, director of the University of West Florida Grammar Hotline. "Now, the tendency is to distinguish between...appropriate and not appropriate or standard and non-standard."

"You have to consider your audience and the occasion and make your language fit that," she said.

Gender has become a touchy grammatical issue with the rise of feminism.

Hixon said she advises callers to follow traditional rules, which hold that "he" is the correct pronoun for a person of either gender, although there is a trend to use "he-she."

"One of my students, a feminist, not only wants 'he-she,' but she wants 'she' first," Hixon said.

Bomb found in Cyclone stadium

AMES, Iowa — Police investigating the placement of a ticking bomb at Iowa State University's Cyclone Stadium said Sunday they were awaiting a laboratory analysis of debris from the explosive device.

The bomb was detonated by Ames police after it was discovered by a clean-up crew following Saturday's K-State-Iowa State football game in which the Cyclones won 48-19.

Captain John Cable of the Ames Police Department said Sunday that no threats had been received prior to the discovery of a bomb hidden in the bleachers. He said there were no suspects.

Police were called to the stadium at 5:19 p.m. Saturday, or about an hour after the end of the game attended by 32,305 people.

The cylindrical bomb was about three to four inches in diameter and seven inches long and was taped to a clock. It was taken to a nearby field, packed in sandbags and detonated at about 5:45 p.m.

Cable said investigators did not know when it was set to explode.

He said a laboratory analysis by the state Division of Criminal Investigation should help identify the explosives and provide clues to the power of the device. There were no injuries.

Cable said the stadium is cleaned after each game and that the bomb could have been placed in the stands anytime after crews finished mopping up after the Nebraska game the previous week.

Benefit helps young leukemia victim, family

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

Despite her very young age, Megan Torrey has undoubtedly been exposed to much love and caring.

Megan, who is nearly 19 months old, has leukemia.

The latest in a number of benefits on Megan's behalf was held Saturday night at the Ranch Saloon. The Ranch Saloon, located east of Manhattan on Highway 24, hosted a pork barbecue benefit supper.

On a handwritten poster announcing a "Pork BBQ Supper Benefit for Megan Torrey," there was a short note squeezed in at the bottom: "a small cost for a big cause."

Three weeks before Megan was diagnosed with leukemia, her parents, Dudley and Denise Torrey, took her to their family doctor. Megan had swollen glands in her neck, arm pits and groin area, said Pat Torrey, Dudley's sister-in-law from St. George.

At first, the doctor thought it was a virus. Megan was going in once a week for blood analysis. The doctor then referred her to the University of Kansas Medical Center because he thought she might have a type of leukemia, Denise Torrey said.

The next few days included a spinal tap, a bone marrow examination and blood transfusions. It was then they diagnosed Megan as having ALL (Acute Lymphoblastic Leukemia), Denise said.

"She has the best leukemia there is to have. We are so lucky we caught it before it was in her nervous system," Denise said. "Ninty-seven percent of the kids who have ALL go into remission within four weeks. Megan was one of those kids.

"You couldn't tell anything is wrong with her now, except she has lost some hair because of the chemotherapy."

Several groups and individuals have contributed money to the family. Over $4,000 has been raised so far, said Bob Dieball, owner of the Ranch Saloon.

"The money raised goes to everything the insurance doesn't cover. His (Dudley's) insurance pays only so much, and the rest they (the parents) will have to pay," Pat Torrey said.

"When Megan was in a room with four other children, it cost $215 a day," Denise Torrey said. "She later had to go into an isolated room, which I'm not sure how much it cost."

Dieball and others donated the hog and other items for the barbecue.

"The Ranch Saloon Pool Team had been sitting on some money for years. They kicked in $200 toward the hog," Dieball said.

The barbeque attracted more than 200 people — most of them friends of the family.

"I went to high school with the baby's grandfather (Mark 'Jiggs' Torrey) at St. George," said Kay Parker of Manhattan, who came to the supper with her husband.

Dudley Torrey, an apprentice carpenter, is a union member of Local 918 and works for Baril General Contractor in Manhattan. Many of the local union's members helped with the benefit in some fashion, said Bob Moody, business manager for the Plumbers and Pipe Fitters Local Union 609 and president of the Riley-Geary Co. Building Traders. Local unions include carpenters, laborers, plumbers and pipe fitters.

"We appreciate the support that they've given. We think it is for one heck of a good cause," Moody said. "It kind of goes to show (that) when there's a problem in the neighborhood or with our people, we try to get out and do whatever we can."

A raffle was held Saturday night for an 870 Remington shotgun. Members of the local unions sold the raffle tickets and took donations, said Doug Zarger of St. George.

The Modern Woodsman of America, the Torrey's insurance company, will match the money raised by the sale of raffle tickets up to $750, Zarger said.

In addition, Wal-Mart, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd., is raising money on Megan's behalf. Denise Torrey was a former employee of Wal-Mart but cannot work now because she stays home with Megan.

"The people at Wal-Mart have been a big help, too. They have raised money by a bake sale, raffling a microwave and placing an aquarium (in the store's entrance)," Denise said.

"You don't know how many friends you have until something like this happens," she said. "The place (the Ranch) last night was packed. It was so good to see so many concerned people there. We really appreciate this."

U.S. leads in foreign military instruction

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Over the past year, more than 22,000 foreign soldiers received some type of training from their American counterparts in programs that have made this country the free world's leading military instructor.

The programs, some financed by taxpayers and some tied to payments by the foreign country, have all been authorized by Congress. They stand separate from covert training provided to insurgent movements around the world.

Military training of foreign troops has gained attention as President Reagan signed a bill providing $100 million in aid to the Contra guerrillas fighting Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government. Officials say the Contras may get training on U.S. territory if Nicaragua's neighbors balk at setting up U.S. training camps on their soil.

The Contras will join soldiers, airmen, sailors and marines from more than 80 nations in getting instruction from their American counterparts, most of it done in this country.

The U.S. training programs are of two kinds — instruction tied to weapon sales and instruction provided under the Pentagon's International Military Education and Training Program, which seeks to build rapport with foreign military leaders around the world.

The first program is more limited. Every time the UNITED States sells a new type of tank, plane or missile to another country, that country's military can get training in its use from U.S. personnel as well as training on its maintenance by the manufacturer. Military training in running logistic supply systems is also offered.

The Pentagon estimates almost 7,900 foreigners received training as a result of foreign military sales in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30. Slightly more than 8,000 received such training in fiscal 1985 and the Pentagon says the number has stayed in that range over the past few years.

The IMET program, meantime, goes beyond the handling of specific weapons. Its focus is primarily on the professional soldier, particularly officers, and much of the trainng is provided at staff and war colleges.

About 15,000 foreign military personnel received instruction in fiscal 1986, according to Lt. Col. Don Brownlee, a Pentagon spokesman.

Of that total, about 6,500 foreign soldiers got training at the expense of the U.S. taxpayer and 8,500 thanks to a decision by their country to either pay for such schooling directly or in conjunction with weapon purchase payments.

Fugitives caught buying wedding rings

Police return lovers to separate jails

By The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — A pair of fugitive lovers, reunited in a daring helicopter escape from prison, were tracked down by agents who monitored a checking account used to pay for their wedding rings, authorities said.

U.S. marshals said they arrested Ronald J. McIntosh and Samantha Dorinda Lopez at a suburban shopping mall Saturday when they tried to pick up her wedding ring set.

Before the two were driven away from the mall in separate police cars, McIntosh leaned out the window of his car and yelled "I love you!" to Lopez.

They were scheduled for arraignment in federal court Monday on charges of hijacking, escape and kidnapping, said Inspector Louis Stefanelli of the marshal's office.

McIntosh and Lopez worked together at the country-club style federal prison at Pleasanton and often were seen walking together and holding hands, which is allowed there, said Warden Rob Roberts.

Federal authorities said McIntosh was arrested at Merksamer Jewelers and Lopez was picked up in a nearby store at the Birdcage Walk shopping mall in Citrus Heights, about 10 miles northeast of downtown Sacramento.

"We caught them completely by surprise," said Chief Deputy Marshal David Stanton. "We'd been trailing them and had some very good leads due to the photograph that was out. We found out they'd been in the mall area and were going to return."

Marshals said they traced the couple to the story by monitoring a checking account that McIntosh kept under the aias Lyle Thompson. They said they were alerted when a $4,600 check to the jewelry store cleared the bank Thursday.

Prosecutors said they feared McIntosh, 43, might have had access to as much as $2 million. He pleaded guilty earlier this year to state charges in an $18 million San Francisco-based futures scam, and was finishing a federal sentence for wire fraud before serving four years on the state conviction.

U.S. Marshal Arthur Van Court said investigators believed the couple wanted to get married and would buy jewelry.

Carol Folsom, assistant manager at Merksamer Jewelers, said the couple had visited the store twice before. She said store officials became suspicious because they took only moments to pick out and buy about $5,500 worth of jewelry.

"They were very nice pieces of jewelry, but they had very little consideration as to what they were buying. ... People don't spend just 10 or 15 minutes on that size purchase," Folsom said. She said a cash down payment was made Monday, and the balance was paid by check Tuesday.

Sales clerk Patty Morris said Sunday that the couple had returned Saturday to pick up a two-ring wedding set for Lopez, and that they were to have returned this week for a ring for McIntosh that had been sent out for engraving.

McIntosh was carrying a briefcase containing a 9mm automatic pistol, a .357-caliber revolver and 100 rounds of ammunition, Van Court said. A second 9mm automatic pistol was in the glove compartment of the couple's vehicle. All three weapons were loaded, he added.

He said McIntosh tried unsuccessfully to open the briefcase just before he was arrested. "If he had gotten time to open the briefcase for his weapon, we might have had a very dangerous situation," the marshal said.

Israeli planes attack bases, Palestinian command station

By The Associated Press

SIDON, Lebanon — A squadron of Israeli warplanes attacked Palestinian guerrilla bases near south Lebanon's port city of Sidon on Sunday, destroying a command post and wounding at least three people, police reported.

Ambulances and fire engines raced to the village of Darb el-Sim on Sidon's southern outskirts, police said.

The jets made four bombing and rocketing runs against a naval base for Palestine Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah guerrilla group at 4:35 p.m., destroying a three-story command post, according to police.

In Tel Aviv, the Israeli military command said the planes attacked a naval base used to launch attacks against Israel. It did not specify which organization used the base.

The brief announcement said the pilots reported direct hits and returned safely.

The jets dropped smoke canisters once the bombing runs were over, police said.

"The whole area was engulfed in thick gray smoke and no one could see anything afterwards," one reporter said from the scene.

The attack came a day after a 22-year-old Israeli seminary student was stabbed to death in the Moslem quarter of the walled Old City of Jerusalem.

It was Israel's 14th air attack in Lebanon this year.

The last raid was Oct. 16, when Israeli jets struck at guerrilla targets near Sidon. One Phantom F-4e Israeli jet was shot down, and an Israeli flier who bailed out was captured by Shiite Moslem militiamen. Israel rescued another pilot.

Critic to discuss masculinity at Humanities Series Lecture

By The Collegian Staff

Coppelia Kahn, a leading representative of feminist Shakespearean criticism from Wesleyan University, will discuss masculine identity in the works of Shakespeare as part of the Humanities Series Lectures at 4 p.m. today in Union 212.

Kahn will focus on the psychological and social ways by which a society defines manhood and how that definition depends to a great extent on women.

"Shakespeare's works reflect and voice a masculine anxiety about the uses of patriarchal power over women, specifically about men's control over women's sexualtiy, which arises from this disparity between men's social dominance and their peculiar emotional vulnerabilitiy to women," Kahn wrote in her book, "Man's Estate: Masculine Identity in Shakespeare."

Her lecture, "Shakespeare's 'Timon of Athens,' Patronage and Maternal Power: Feminist Psychohistory," is sponsored by the humanities departments, the Women's Studies Program and the College of Arts and Sciences.

Preceding the speech, the K-State Collegium Musicum Baroque Ensemble will perform Purcell's "Timon of Athens," at 3:30 p.m. in Union 212.

Closing files violates right to information

The Defense Department is trying to find ways to limit Soviet access to unclassified material. This means everything from news stories to highly technical scientific papers.

In the past few months, executives of private electronic data banks have been approached by CIA, FBI and Pentagon officials who have attempted to find ways to place controls on subscribers to their systems.

How ridiculous can the Defense Department get? Don't the men in the Pentagon realize that they would not limit foreign access to information nearly as much as they would our access to information? We're talking about news stories currently available to the general public, not top-secret, classified government documents.

What is almost as bad as the restrictions themselves is the authoritarian manner in which the Pentagon is going about instituting these restrictions. The Defense Department has made it clear that it will implement its restrictions; the only question is how far it will be able to go with those restrictions.

And what about those "highly technical scientific papers?" How are scientists and researchers to know if their findings are correct if those findings are not available for scrutiny from their peers? The very nature of the Pentagon's restrictions will be detrimental to Strategic Defense Initiative research, as well as many other scientific projects of much greater potential.

In a sense, these efforts are comparable to the infamous "disinformation campaign" aimed at Col. Moammar Gadhafy. By using the press to influence the decisions of a select group of individuals, the administration ultimately exposed the American public to false information. Now, when the Defense Department wants to limit a select group of people from gaining information through the press, it must limit the American people's access to that information as well.

President Reagan said in his speech last Thursday that "given the facts, the American people will make the right decision." We may never get a chance to prove him right if we are not given the facts.

Firing AIDS patients shows discrimination

Three months after Todd Shuttleworth was promoted for his "outstanding work" and "tenacious research," he was fired from his $18,000-a-year job as a budget analyst for Broward County, Fla. The reason — he has the fatal disease AIDS.

John Canada, Broward County's budget director, was quoted in the Miami Herald as saying, "It's a tragic thing, but he was fired because he has an incurable disease that may infect other people."

Shuttleworth brought suit against Broward County because he says he could have worked 18 months longer, until contracting pneumonia.

The Shuttleworth case stands out among AIDS-discrimination suits because it is the first case to reach federal court. It could change how employers treat thousands of employees. According to federal researchers, some 27,000 people nationwide have been afflicted with AIDS and almost 10 times this number are expected to contract the disease during the next five years.

The main issue is whether AIDS should be deemed a handicap under federal anti-discrimination law. AIDS meets the statutory definition of handicap: an impairment that substantially limits the activities of those afflicted with it.

Broward County's attorney, Gordon D. Rogers, believes AIDS is not a handicap because a handicapped person must be otherwise qualified to work. An employee with AIDS, he says, can't be considered qualified because there is a remote danger the fatal disease could be transmitted to co-workers or the public.

Shuttleworth said one of the reasons he brought the suit is because medical experts knew at the time that AIDS isn't communicable through casual contact.

Broward County said Shuttleworth was fired when medical experts were still uncertain about how the disease is transmitted.

Whether the federal court decides that Shuttleworth was fired with the most recent medical information, future cases and decisions to fire employees should be based on up-to-date information.

Firing employees for the sole reason that they have AIDS only increases public misconceptions. The enormous amount of money spent on these court cases could be put to better use in finding a cure for AIDS.

Stress takes fun out of college life

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

"I think I have too much stress in my life. I think my arteries are closing. You can't do good homework when you can feel your arteries closing."

—Sally Brown, Charlie's little sister.

We've all felt that way now and then, if not most of the time. Whether it's a 40-page term paper due at 5 p.m. the next day or a "do-or-die" essay test we've waited to cram for 'til the night before, any stressful situation is bound to upset us, either by sending our blood pressure soaring, our stomach churning or our back muscles into knots.

Panic and anxiety-induced responses such as heart pounding, teeth grinding and the sudden urge to "down a few" (beers or fellow students, whatever the case may be) may have served our ancestors well, but do us more harm than good.

In the good old days, that extra burst of adrenaline "primed" our great-great-great grandparents for a sudden "fight or flight" situation. Currently, however, most situations aren't cut and dried enough to be solved by the "fight or flight" alternatives. Thus, this adrenergic response is inappropriate, and can be dangerous.

Research has shown that the most "stressed out" people show two components of behavior. First, there is a tendency to try to accomplish too many things in too little time — a tendency most college students are expected to strive for. Secondly, there is a free-floating hostility. These people are irritated by trivial things.

According to the American Academy of Family Physicians, two-thirds of office visits to family doctors are prompted by stress-related symptoms. The costs of such stress symptoms in absenteeism, company medical expenses and cost productivity have been estimated at $50 billion to $75 billion a year.

Stress is now known to be a major contributor, either directly or indirectly, to coronary heart disease, cancer, lung ailments, accidental injuries, cirrhosis of the liver (so much for drinking your troubles away) and suicide. Life itself has become the principal cause of illness.

College students stand by seemingly helpless and watch stress wreak havoc in their lives. Stress can ruin good friendships and often "do in" relationships. They constantly hear how "these are supposedly the best years of your life," and wonder "why?" If nights of insomnia and days spent "wired," constantly worrying over major crises of the week, are the "best," I hate to see what the coming years have to offer.

How can we deal with the stressful present? Psychologists have found a number of personal factors that seem to be helpful in coping with stress. For instance, the sense of being in control of one's life, having a network of friends or family to provide "social support" and such personality factors as flexibility and hopefulness help decrease stress.

Experts say the key to stress management is learning how to relax. Meditation may work for some, others try psychotherapy. Still others require nothing more than regular exercise and vacations. A night spent with friends finding out how their life is also in ruin can make you feel less alone.

A certain amount of stress can be a positive influence in your life, however. The challenge lies in finding the level of manageable stress that excites life, instead of ruining it. As University of Nebraska cardiologist Robert Elliot puts it, "Rule No. 1 is, don't sweat the small stuff. Rule No. 2 is, it's all small stuff. And if you can't fight and you can't flee, flow."

On the lighter side, how about a quick test — don't worry, you needn't study for this one — on how vulnerable you are to stress? Parts of the following test were developed by two Boston University Medical Center psychologists. The other, more applicable parts were developed by yours truly. Score each item from one (almost always) to five (never) according to how much each statement applies to you.

1. I eat at last one hot, balanced meal a day. (Revised college version — I eat at least one meal a day that I didn't find at the back of the refrigerator covered with green slime.)

2. I get seven to eight hours of sleep at least four nights a week. (Revised college version — I get at least seven to eight hours of sleep per week.)

3. I give and receive affection regularly. (Revised college version — I give a little affection when I know I'll receive more in return.)

4. I have at least one relative within 50 miles on whom I can rely. (Revised college version — delete "within 50 miles.")

5. I exercise to the point of perspiration at least twice a week. (Revised college version — I perspire at the thought of exercise.)

6. I smoke less that half a pack of cigarettes a day.

7. I take fewer than five alcoholic drinks a week. (Revised college version — add "the rest I buy myself.")

8. I am the appropriate weight for my height.

9. I have an income adequate to meet basic expenses.

10. I get strength from my religious beliefs. (Revised college version — I'm not sure what those religious beliefs are.)

11. I regularly attend club or social activities. (Revised college version — I spend all my spare time in Aggieville.)

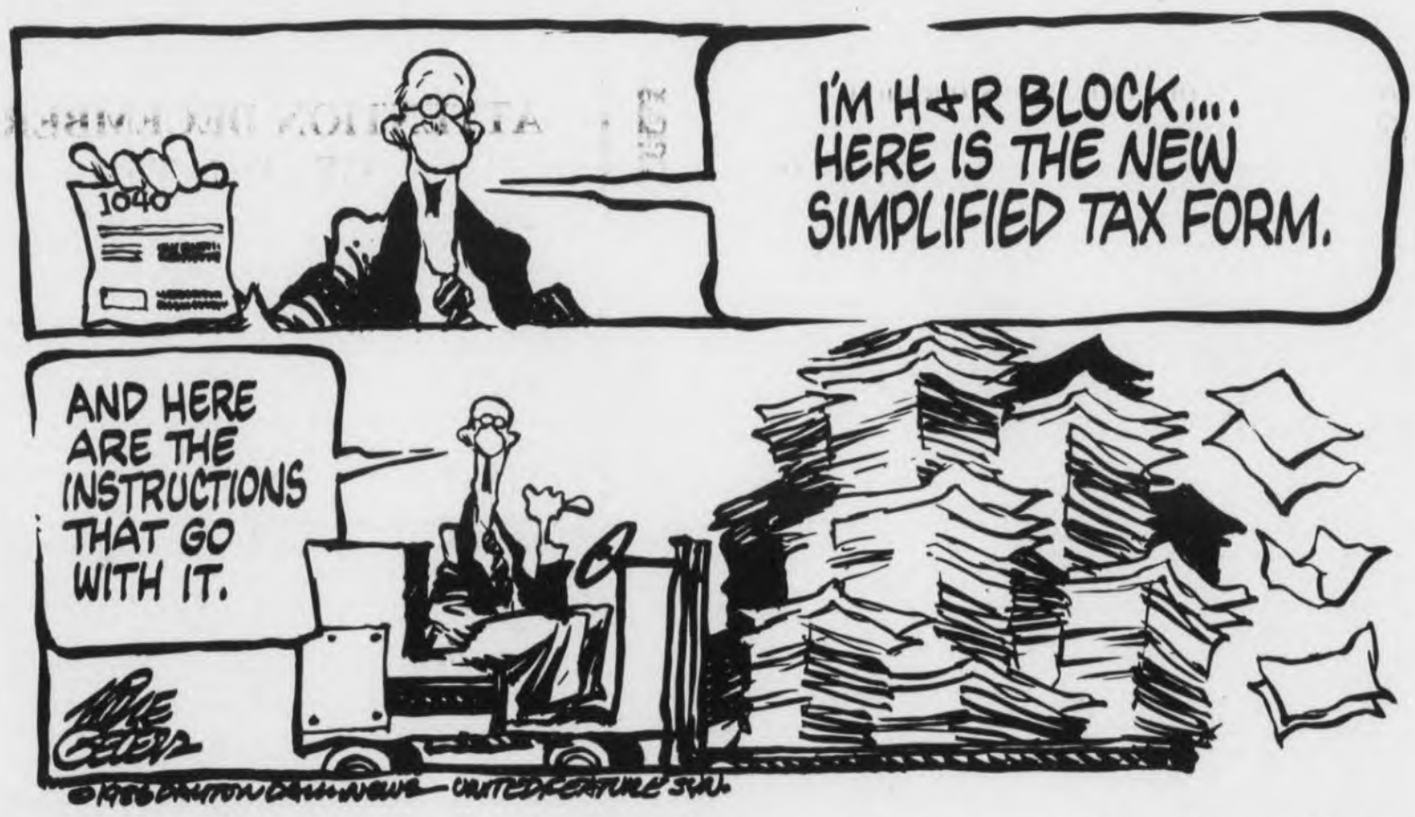
12. I have a network of friends and acquaintances.

13. I have one or more friends to confide in about personal matters. (Revised college version — I have one or more friends who'd die laughing if and when I confided in them.)

14. I am in good health.

15. I am able to speak openly about my feelings when angry or worried. (Revised college version — I scream a lot.)

16. I have regular conversations with the people I live with about domestic problems: chores, money and daily living issues.



17. I do something fun at last once a week. (Revised college verson — I do something fun all week and often live to regret it.)

18. I am able to organize my time effectively. (Another humorous one.)

19. I drink fewer than three cups of coffee (or tea or cola drinks) a day.

20. I take quiet time for myself during the day. (Revised college version — add, "after telling everybody else to bug off.")

Searching for Reagan's good deeds

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

People have often accused me of being anti-Reagan. I really don't know why. All I ever said about him was that he is an evil, lying, two-faced, manipulative scumsucker. If that makes me anti-Reagan, then I plead guilty.

All kidding aside, I am anti-Reagan out of necessity, not desire. I seem to be stuck on the idea that good political leaders should be honest, kind and humane people. If I could see any of these qualities in our president, I would be first in line to repeal the 22nd Amendment to enable him to serve another term. As it stands now, I will be standing in the line to get tickets for his impeachment trial.

People always say to me, "Why don't you ever say anything nice about the president?" I would if I could, but I can't so I won't. This idea still intrigues me, though. Is there something Reagan has done that we can be truly proud of? Thus, I have been given my quest — to search for the "good deeds" of Ronald Reagan.

Among the good deeds cited by Reagan supporters are his economic reforms. He took this country out of a recession and created an economic boom. Reagan's policies saved this country from economic disaster.

From a business standpoint, this may have been a good move. This question remains in doubt, for the debate on the long-range success of Reaganomics is still raging. But from a human standpoint, the evidence points toward failure.

When discussing economics, most people forget the system's basic purpose. They treat it like the weather, something natural that must be endured. They don't realize the economy was created by people to serve people. The system was devised to help distribute the goods and sevices produced by the people in the system. If the economic system creates hardship and unemployment, then it is not living up to the purpose for which it was designed.

In 1980, Reagan campaigned that President Carter's economic policies had caused rampant inflation and unemployment. Unemployment had been steadily declining during Carter's last years in office. The rate kept dropping until it settled around 7 percent, about six months into Reagan's first term. Then Reaganomics took over. Unemployment shot above 10 percent for the first time since the Great Depression. Reaganomics did lower inflation, but at the expense of many working people.

Now, unemployment has settled to around 7 percent again. Reagan claims this is "natural" unemployment. Most economists will tell you that 3 percent is a good natural unemployment figure. The Soviet Union will tell you 0 percent unemployment is possible and that "natural" unemployment is merely a defect in the system being used. They laugh when the United States has 7 percent unemployment and 2 million homeless people. Being showed up by the evil empire in the humanitarian department does not inspire confidence in Reagan's dedication to the people.

His newest economic policy is tax reform, or simplification, as he likes to call it. Many people see tax simplification as a badly needed change. The old system was so complicated no one could understand it. But simple does not mean better. You wouldn't trade your car for a bicycle just because it is simpler. It is still complicated enough that H&R Block tax preparation service is expecting more profits than ever.

While it will be months or possibly years before we know the effect of tax reform, the one sure thing is that taxes will be raised. Reagan wouldn't have gone through the effort of changing the system if he didn't need the money to cover his enormous budget deficits. This is sure a turnaround from two years ago when he promised he would not raise taxes if re-elected. Oh well, another day, another White House deception.

These newly raised taxes will go to service the national debt, which has gone out of control during this administration. It started with Reagan's across-the-board tax cuts. This was supposed to help the people, or at least a few of them. An across-the-board cut means an average taxpayer may get $50 while a wealthy person might get $50,000. This tax cut was aimed at the rich, while the poor will have to pay for the deficit caused by the cuts.

The president continues to enlarge the deficit even more. He clamors for more defense spending, then blames the Democrats for the deficit. Reagan has always given vocal support to a balanced budget amendment, yet he can't balance his own budget. It was the increased spending and budget deficits that were responsible for this economic recovery. Is he trying to make himself the last president who could use fiscal planning to handle economic problems? Does Reagan know what economics is?

Wow. I ran out of space and never left the country. Well, you'll just have to wait for next week, when the quest for good deeds will take us to far-away lands to study the "Ronbo" style of foreign policy. By the way, if you have any clues to where I might find the good deeds of Ronald Reagan, send them in. I haven't lost faith yet, but the light is growing dim.

'Masterful dialogue, low physical action' enlivens performance

By LAURIE FAIRBURN
Entertainment Editor

The masterful dialogue of W. Somerset Maugham wove lace around some and nooses around others as they engaged in a verbal contest of wits in "The Constant Wife," performed Saturday in Nichols Hall Theatre.

Play Review

The play is deliberately low in physical action, emphasizing the power of an arched eyebrow or pursed lips. And, given the delightful complexity of the verbal banter among the cast, the audience has time for little else.

The story, set in the 1920s, takes place in the drawing room of Constance and John Middleton's home. The room is contained in a boxing ring, providing the proper environment for the fleet-tongued bout taking place. The contestants are introduced and helped into the ring by Bentley, the butler, who also signals the beginning and end of each round by ringing a brass bell.

The characters' verbal sparring concerns the role of a woman in marriage; specifically, in a marriage where the man is unfaithful. The woman is Constance. The unfaithful husband is John. The mistress is Constance's dearest friend, Marie-Louise.

As opinions of what Constance should do about the situation spill from her mother, Mrs. Culver, and her sister, Martha Culver, as well as her friend, Barbara Fawcett, they reveal the diversity of philosophies.

Mrs. Culver, played by Megan Garner, junior in theater, believes it is in men's nature to wander, and if they do, it is the woman's fault. Garner's characterization of the proper, no-nonsense Mrs. Culver is delightful. Her mannerisms and posturing, combined with her lilting, high-pitched voice, bring to life a character that is captivating and thoroughly enjoyable to watch.

Martha Culver, played by Nancy Sloan, senior in theater, is of a decidedly different mold. She thinks the man is a slimy snake. Of course, her sister should divorce him without a moment's hesitation. Sloan plays Martha with clever calculation, spitting her most venomous lines with direct aim. She's dangerously spunky, and when she strides purposefully across the ring, the best place to be is directly behind her, well out of firing range.

Contance's friend, Barbara Fawcett, a less emotional, more practical observer, would like Constance to come into her decorating business with her. As Constance protests, she offers her some advice: "Independence is a very good thing, and a woman who stands on her own feet can look to the future with a good deal of confidence."

Barbara, played by Susanne Leipold, graduate student in speech, is a most unintrusive character. Leipold plays her softly, and she comes off as someone wise who allows people their choices without interfering. She gives the impression that she knows Constance will see her way soon enough, that she will still be there, and that is the quality of a true friend.

John and Constance are a couple devoted to one another, each in their own way. Constance has always been aware of John's affair, but chooses to ignore it because she doesn't feel she has the right or the need to protest. After the affair becomes public knowledge, she is inspired to take Barbara up on her offer. John protests, but concedes to her wish.

New leads may speed Alzheimer's cure

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Scientists are peeling away the mystery from Alzheimer's disease, with discoveries reported in recent days pointing toward the cause and perhaps the cure of the leading cause of senility among elderly Americans.

"We are at an exciting time in this research," said Dr. Andrew Monjan, acting chief of the neuroscience of aging branch of the National Institute on Aging. Potential causes and cures "are no longer as distant," he said.

Three new pieces of work coming out last week were exciting, agreed Dr. Katherine Bick, deputy director of the National Institute for Neurological and Communicative Disorders and Strokes.

"The data show that we haven't been barking up the wrong trees in a number of the areas that are being dealt with," she said. "But I don't think this is the last word on any of these things. We've just moved a step forward and now are going to be able to ask a few more sophisticated questions."

Alzheimer's disease destroys elderly people's memory, their speech, their mobility and even their ability to feed themselves. An estimated 2.5 million Americans have it, and 100,000 die from it each year.

Despite its prevalence, however, Alzheimer's disease is tough to recognize. Until now, there has been no clear hallmark of the disease. Diagnosing it amounts to ruling out other illnesses that produce similar symptoms.

At a scientific meeting last week in Washington, Dr. Peter Davies of Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York told of tracking down a protein called A-68.

If this work holds up to further scrutiny, it could be the basis of the first test for Alzheimer's.

It appears as though large amounts of this protein occur in the brains of Alzheimer's victims but not those of healthy people. This means it may be possible to diagnose the disease in its early stages with a spinal tap. Such early diagnosis will probably be essential if medicine is to be successful in stopping the disease before it destroys the brain.

Finding such a test has been a top goal of government-sponsored research, Monjan said.

"If we are able to come up with a treatment," he said in an interview, "the earlier we can intervene in the development of the disease, the greater the likelihood that we can make an impact on the outcome of the disease."

No such cure exists for Alzheimer's disease, and none is imminent. But another new study suggests a possible way to at least relieve some of the worst symptoms. Dr. William K. Summers of the University of California, Los Angeles, last week published his experiments with a long-forgotten drug that seems, at least temporarily, to sharpen victims' memories.

While taking this drug, patients were able to help care for themselves, recognize relatives, and in less severe cases, even play golf or work part-time.

Summers is the only researcher to achieve success so far with this experimental drug, called tetrahydroaminoacrine, or THA. Monjan said the medicine will have to be subjected to large, well-controlled studies before experts can be certain it is truly effective.

Another thread of evidence revealed last week was the isolation of the gene responsible for a protein that may play a key role in Alzheimer's. This gene, found by Dr. Dmitry V. Goldhaber and colleagues from the National Institutes of Health, makes a protein that clogs the brains of people with the disease.

'Cats run empty in 48-19 loss to Iowa State

Staff/Robert Squires

K-State running back Tony Jordon is stopped by the Iowa State defense as he dives during the first quarter of the 'Cats' 48-19 loss Saturday in Ames, Iowa. Jordon broke the K-State single-game rushing record by running for 218 yards. He also scored three touchdowns.

Criner's firing aids emotions; Espinoza riddles 'Cat defense

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

AMES, Iowa — K-State Coach Stan Parrish said it was an emotionally and physically drained Wildcat football team that fell 48-19 Saturday to Iowa State.

"I don't know if we let down," Parrish said. "We're out of gas. We're like a car who has been riding on 'E' for a long time. We ran out of gas a little bit today."

The Wildcats, now 2-8 overall and 1-5 in Big Eight Conference play, ran into an emotionally charged Iowa State squad that had been shocked earlier in the week with the dismissal of its head coach. Jim Criner was fired Wednesday after the NCAA uncovered alleged rule violations in the Cyclones' football program.

Criner was still a presence at Cyclone Stadium Saturday and was with the team before and after the game. He even spoke to senior members of the squad prior to the contest.

"He told us to win it for ourselves and make our time here worthwhile," said senior defensive tackle Greg Liter. "He said he was proud of us and glad we worked through the adversity."

Another Cyclone senior, quarterback Alex Espinoza, overshadowed a brilliant performance by K-State running back Tony Jordan, who set a Wildcat single-game rushing mark with 218 yards.

Espinoza picked apart a depleted Wildcat secondary with four touchdown passes and 286 yards passing before being removed in the fourth quarter.

"We lost players again today," Parrish said. "We're out. We don't have any defensive backs left. The four that finished the game are the last four we have."

Those four, however, saw more than enough of Espinoza during the afternoon.

"He's got a lot of zip on the ball," said Wildcat defensive back Steve Compton, who was ejected in the third quarter after receiving an unsportsmanlike conduct penalty. "What makes him different from everybody else is that he puts the ball in a position where if his offensive player can't catch it, he'll be sure the defensive player can't also."

The game began on a dismal note for the 'Cats. First, the Cyclones marched 80 yards in nine plays after the opening kickoff to take a 7-0 lead. Then on the Wildcats' first play from scrimmage, quarterback Randy Williams was hit and fumbled the ball as he dropped back to pass. The Cyclones recovered on K-State's 17-yard line.

But the Cyclones, 6-4 overall and 3-3 in the conference, began a series of miscues and missed scoring opportunities in the ensuing possession. After an Espinoza pass was dropped in the end zone, Iowa State's Rick Frank pulled a 30-yard field goal attempt to the left.

Parrish then replaced Williams at quarterback with junior Tim Hanson on the next series, and Parrish stuck with Hanson the rest of the game.

"I made the decision," Parrish said. "I just decided to make a change. I thought Tim went in and did a heck of a job."

K-State was unable to move the ball early in the first quarter. On a punt attempt, the snap sailed over the head of punter Troy Faunce and the Cyclones recovered in the end zone for an apparent 13-0 lead. But the Cyclones were caught with 12 men on the field, and the Wildcats had a first down and another chance.

This time the Wildcats took advantage of the opportunity. Aided by the running of Jordan and a 35-yard pass from Hanson to wide receiver Todd Elder, K-State tied the game at 7. Jordan scored on a 3-yard run.

The Wildcats actually had a chance to take the lead in the first quarter. After stopping the Cyclones on the next possession, the 'Cats marched 56 yards to the Iowa State 3-yard line before the drive stalled. Normally sure-footed kicker Mark Porter missed a 20-yard field goal attempt to the right.

The two teams traded touchdowns in the second quarter with K-State scoring on a 74-yard pass from Hanson to Jordan — the longest pass play in the Big Eight this season. Porter missed the extra point to leave the Wildcats trailing 14-13 midway into the period.

After a Frank field goal, the Wildcats tried unsuccessfully to grind away the last few minutes of the half on the ground. After a Wildcat punt left the Cyclones on their own 49 with about a minute to play, Espinoza took over. It took him five plays to direct the Cyclones 51 yards and give them a 24-13 halftime advantage.

After a Wildcat punt on the first possession of the second half, Espinoza connected with senior wide receiver Robbie Minor for a 54-yard touchdown pass on a third-and-four play. Two more third-quarter touchdowns gave the Cyclones a 45-13 lead and put the game out of reach.

The only fourth-quarter excitement was provided by K-State's Jordan, who broke the school single-game rushing record at 12:27 in the period with a 5-yard run up the middle. Earlier in the quarter, Jordan took a handoff from the Wildcats' 11, veered left and didn't stop until he had reached the Iowa State end zone.

Jordan's 218 yards on 35 carries eclipsed the record set by L.J. Brown when he ran for 200 yards against Air Force in 1979.

Jordan's record provides silver lining in otherwise dreary loss to Cyclones

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State football fans didn't have to look far to find a silver lining in an otherwise dreary 48-19 loss to Iowa State Saturday.

Junior running back Tony Jordan ran through, around and over the Cyclones' defense to the tune of 218 yards on 35 carries. He also caught one pass that he turned into a 74-yard touchdown — one of three on the day for Jordan.

His rushing performance shattered the previous K-State single-game individual record of 200 yards set by L.J. Brown against Air Force in 1979.

An exhausted Jordan was less than ecstatic after the game. He said the record was a small consolation in light of the team's loss.

"I guess in the future, it will be (something to be proud of)," he said. "Right now, I'm really disappointed because we didn't win. Coming in, I thought we could really do well. I guess it's something I can look back on and smile, but right now it's kind of hard to take because we were looking forward to winning."

Jordan set the record at the 12:27 mark of the fourth quarter on a five-yard run up the middle. Jordan had motioned to the sidelines for a breather but was told to stay in by the coaching staff, who had become aware of Jordan's proximity to the record.

"I guess coach (Stan Parrish) wanted me to toughen up a little bit. I had a few more left in me, and I think he knew that," Jordan said.

Jordan had picked up a substantial chunk of yardage earlier in the quarter to set up the record-breaking run. After a 35-yard run was called back because of a holding penalty, Jordan took the next handoff at the K-State 11-yard line and broke free along the left sidelines for an 89-yard touchdown run.

Jordan began to run out of steam once inside Cyclone territory but managed to huff and puff his way into the Cyclones' end zone despite being chased by two defenders.

"I was pretty worn down," Jordan said. "I thought they were going to catch me. I guess they were as tired as I was."

Jordan, who said he had never really considered the record within his reach prior to the game, credited the offensive line with a large share of his success on the day.

"I think it's a good achievement for the whole offensive line," he said, "because they really blocked well to help me get it. All I have to do is run behind their blocks. (People will) read my name, but I think the line really contributed to help me get it."

"I think as a whole offensive line," senior tackle Rockey Dvorak said, "we can take pride in that (record) because we've worked awfully hard all year."

Parrish said Jordan's performance should help silence his critics.

"I'll tell you what kind of kid he is," Parrish said. "I just walked him out and he told me, 'They could have it all if we could win.' He's a guy a lot of people said couldn't play (and) wasn't tough enough. I think he's doing a pretty darn good job for us."

Senior offensive guard Bob Bessert said Jordan's recent performance has not only bolstered Jordan's confidence but increased the offensive line's confidence in Jordan, as well.

"We're excited about blocking for him, especially when he blows off those 90 yarders," Bessert said.

New coach promotes discipline at Colorado

COLORADO

Last Season's Record: 8-20/0-14 (8th in conference)
Collegian's Projected Finish: 8th
Projected All-Big 8 Performer: Matt Bullard (Second Team)

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Apathy.

Colorado first-year head coach Tom Miller didn't waste any time in letting the media know the state of affairs of his last-place Buffaloes Sunday morning at the Big Eight Preseason Basketball Press Day.

"The Bible says 'the last shall come first,' so maybe they were talking about press conferences, too," said Miller, who was the first coach to address the media.

Miller does not inherit an enviable situation in Boulder where the Buffaloes went 0-14 in conference action last year and gained the dubious distinction of being the first team in Big Eight history to drop every conference game.

To complicate matters, Colorado's 6-foot-10 junior forward Torin Williams, who averaged 12.3 points and 4.4 rebounds per game last season, is out for the year after undergoing a hernia operation last month.

Adding insult to injury is the fact that one of the Buffs' lone bright spots last season, 6-10 sophomore Matt Bullard, has been hobbled by ligament damage in his left leg in early-season drills. Bullard is currently suffering from the flu, which caused him to miss last Saturday's exhibition with the Poland national team.

"Matt is someone special to us," said Miller, who was named the Buffaloes' head coach April 2. "He was second in the Newcomer of the Year voting last year. He is a 6-9 (listed at 6-10) guy who can shoot the ball. Matt is a big-time talent."

Miller, 38, is a staunch disciplinarian who was a former player and longtime assistant under Indiana head coach Bobby Knight. He left Knight's national powerhouse in Bloomington in 1980 to direct Cornell University to three consecutive winning seasons over the past three years — the first time that has happened in two decades at Cornell.

"I think Cornell had the same reputation (as Colorado) when I went up there," Miller said. "Beauty is in the eye of the beholder. I interviewed with four schools last spring and I thought Colorado was the clear choice."

While the Rocky Mountains were the clear choice for Miller, the picturesque campus in Boulder has not been the favorite attraction for intrastate high school blue chippers who elected to take their talents elsewhere in recent years.

Last year, Big Eight-rival Kansas plucked All-Americans Mark Randall and Robert Coyne from the Denver metropolitan area, and Georgia Tech signed the nation's No. 1-rated high school point guard, Michael Christian, last season during the early signing period.

Exit Coach Tom Apke, who was dismissed for not attracting quality instate players, and enter Miller, whose job security rests partially on improving instate recruiting.

"It is just like anything else," Miller said. "There is a natural attraction. If you are winning, you act as a magnet to the kids in the state. If you start going downhill, you aren't going to get back up for three or four years.

"Colorado will not always have that many players go to Division I schools," he said. "You might get, at the most, three (major-college) players in one year in Colorado. In the state of New York, for instance, you may get 50 or 60 out of the whole state. You have to identify who you want and go after them and hope they stay at home.

"Remember now, Colorado is a very tough school (to get into) academically."

In direct reflection of Knight, his coaching protege, Miller has installed a strict disciplinary reign over his new team. The first-year boss found the group of players he took over lacking in guidance and authority.

"I try to instill discipline in everything they do," he said.

"I only ask that my players push themselves to become the best basketball players they can possibly be," he added. "The victories are nice, but they're not the main thing. What's important is the belief that what you're doing is right, and that is worth working for."

Parity increasing in league

Basketball prowess aids Big 8 image

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — There was a certain all-for-one and one-for-all attitude in the air when the Big Eight Conference coaches convened Sunday for their annual Preseason Basketball Press Day.

The attitude grew out of the conference's growing influence in the college basketball world.

Coming off of a season in which five Big Eight teams were chosen to the 48-team National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament — Kansas, Oklahoma, Missouri, Iowa State and Nebraska — the consensus of the coaches was that even though last season was the conference's finest to date, the best lies ahead.

"We (the conference) had to get to the Final Four and Kansas did," said Iowa State coach Johnny Orr, "and that was a great thing for the conference."

KU coach Larry Brown knew the Big Eight had potential to become a national powerhouse when he took over the Jayhawk program three years ago.

"That's why I came here, and I think in the coming years our conference is going to be the best in the nation from top to bottom," Brown said.

Not only is last season's successes making it easier on member schools when it comes to recruiting, but it also made it easier to attract top-notch coaches.

"I felt it was a heck of a league," said Colorado Coach Tom Miller, one of four rookie coaches in the Big Eight this season. "I knew this was a great league. People have said that this is a football conference, but I think that is a misconception."

Last season's glory, in some eyes, should not overshadow the upcoming season's chances for even greater heroics by conference members. Some preseason polls rank three Big Eight teams in the nation's top 20 and The Sporting News has projected the Big Eight will again land five teams in the NCAA tourney.

"We ought to shoot for six teams in the NCAA this year," Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs said. "I think it's going to be a great race this year (for the conference title). I don't think there is a single team that is head and shoulders above the rest."

Oklahoma State first-year coach Leonard Hamilton said he didn't listen to those who said OSU's program was leading him down a dead-end street. Despite the Cowboys' past shortcomings, he knew the conference could help him turn things around.

"Nobody had to tell me anything. (Oklahoma State) is in a great conference. It's the fastest growing conference in the nation," Hamilton said.

No one attempted to warn Lon Kruger about returning to K-State, and Kruger said he was pleasantly surprised by what he found upon his return.

"Big Eight basketball is quite different than when I left it," said Kruger, who played at K-State from 1971-74. "There are better athletes now who are more capable of changing the ends of the floor."

But it was the sometimes caustic coach at Missouri, Norm Stewart, who best summed up the attitude of the eight coaches.

"I think the exposure the league has gotten from basketball has been helpful. There are better athletes (and) tremendous facilities," Stewart said. "It's going to be a tremendous year."

Men stun Iowa State squad

'Cat cross country teams win NCAA berths

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

K-State cross country coach John Capriotti received a surprise Saturday morning when, for the first time in school history, the men and women qualified for the NCAA Championships in the same year.

K-State's women's squad captured second place and the Wildcat men slipped past Iowa State for third place in the District Five Championships Saturday at Peoria, Ill.

While the 'Cat women were expected to grab one of the top three spots in the district meet, the men were considered a dark horse to qualify for nationals after finishing fifth in the Big Eight Conference meet two weeks ago.

"It is unbelievable," Capriotti said. "I believed that the women would qualify, but to be honest, I wasn't sure about the men. The men went out after it and fought like animals.

"I thought our chances at best would be an outside shot. Even that could be stretching it...don't ever count anyone out or they will prove you wrong."

It took every bit of effort K-State's men had to nail down the third and final spot and earn a trip to the national meet one week from today in Tucson, Ariz. The 'Cats held off Iowa State by one point, 85 to 86, to seal their fortune.

Colorado claimed first place with 46 points, while Nebraska was second with 68.

"It was intense," Capriotti said of the race for third. "After the meet, the course clerk had us and Iowa State tied. We had to wait a half an hour to see what we got."

Ron Stahl, who ran his first race after he quit before the Big Eight meet but rejoined the team the following week, led K-State's charge with a fourth-place finish in 30 minutes, 46 seconds. Stahl was followed by Pat Hessini (14th), Jim Knudsen (21st), Jan Jonsson (22nd), David Warders (24th), David Keller (42nd) and Rob Hays (46th).

It was the first meet all season the men were able to field their top team.

"In Ron, we have a team leader," Capriotti said. "We all learned a lot, including myself. This team has a lot of character."

K-State's women, as expected, were right in the thick of things to claim the District Five team title thanks to the outstanding efforts of Chris Vanatta, who "stole the show" by winning the individual title with a school-record time of 16:51.

The women, however, fell 10 points short of Colorado, who claimed the men's and women's team titles. The Lady Buffaloes finished third in the conference meet two weeks ago.

"Chris did a great job this week," Capriotti said. "She actually didn't feel good when she ran and didn't take the lead until the final 100 meters.

"A good goal for her would to be in the top 10. She is definitely an all-American," Capriotti said.

Nebraska, with 67 points, was the third team to qualify in the women's division. Oklahoma State, the women's Big Eight champion, was unable to field a team for the district meet. Illness sidelined some of OSU's runners and the Lady Cowboys' top harrier and last year's NCAA third-place finisher, Christine McMiken, was injured and unable to compete.

Other placers for K-State were Betsy Silzer (seventh), Anneli Edling (10th), Angie Barry (17th), Jacque Struckhoff (18th), Alysun Deckert (24th) and Lisa Wakem (27th).

By qualifying for nationals, the women assured themselves of a top-16 ranking, while the men are assured of placing no worse than 20th (based on the maximum number of teams that qualify). Capriotti said he also believes the men will move into the top 20 rankings this week after knocking off Iowa State, which was ranked 12th. The women are currently ranked No. 6.

"The longer you go without winning, the bigger deal it becomes," Capriotti said about qualifying two teams. "It is more of a thought or a dream until it happens. When you think things are not obtainable, then they are not. These kids believe in themselves and their school."

Junior-college transfer assumes leadership role

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Until the final chapter is written in the Norris Coleman saga, a virtual unknown appears to be ready to take over the necessary leadership role vital to any team's success until Coleman returns.

Mitch Richmond, a 6-foot-5 junior-college transfer, shocked the Fort Hood Tankers with a game-high 31 points and 11 rebounds in K-State's 99-78 win Saturday night in Ahearn Field House.

Tack on four assists, four blocked shots and 13-of-20 shooting from the field, and it would be safe to say Richmond's first start for Coach Lon Kruger and K-State could be considered successful.

Richmond compiled impressive honors at Moberly (Mo.) Commnity College: first-team All-American, All-Mid-America and All-Region 16 selections. Still, all of the accolades could not guarantee a smooth transition to major-college ball.

"I was really proud for him tonight because I thought he really made some good decisions, played under control and, of course, his shot selection was real good," Kruger said.

Richmond's shot selection also impressed Fort Hood Coach Ron Foster.

"Did he miss any shots? I don't remember him missing any," Foster said. "We haven't seen a kid outside shoot that well (so far this season) and he did some good things. If he shoots that well over the entire season, (K-State) is going to be extremely tough."

Many times when Fort Hood would make a run at the 'Cats, Richmond played the ace reliever and stopped any serious threats by the opposition with deadly outside shooting, which included one three-point basket.

"You've just got to want it more," Richmond said of his performance.

Richmond, a Fort Lauderdale, Fla., native, said he was naturally nervous before the game started.

"I always get butterflies before the game. But once I get that first pass or something, then I kind of relax and it's all right again," he said.

One tends to quickly lose any nervous feeling when the first shot goes in from the top of the key.

"I felt good when I hit that first shot — I felt good," Richmond said.

And when the shots didn't fall, the unselfish Richmond was back to help his teammates on defense.

"When I did miss a shot, when I did make a bad pass, I didn't put my head down or get mad over it," he said. "I tried to get back on defense and get a defensive rebound to help the team out."

When Kruger was asked if he sought Richmond to be the squad's leader until Coleman's return, Kruger said Richmond has all the right qualities.

"Well, he's got all the qualities to certainly provide that (leadership) — hard worker, unselfish kid, loves to play the game, highly respected by his teammates," Kruger said.

After Saturday night, K-State cage fans can only drool in anticipation when Coleman and Richmond take to the court at the same time.

Bruised Wildcats outgun Fort Hood

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

K-State's men's basketball team limped into Ahearn Field House Saturday night for an exhibition game with a U.S. Armed Forces team from Fort Hood, Texas.

Despite only playing with seven scholarship players, K-State came away with a 99-78 victory over the Fort Hood Tankers, whose record against college teams dropped to 12-6.

K-State entered the game without star forward Norris Coleman, who has been ruled ineligible by the National Collegiate Athletic Association and has yet to seek a court order to have himself reinstated. The Wildcats also came into the game lacking the services of three of their big men — Ron Meyer, Howard Bonser and Percy Eddie — due to injuries.

Without the services of the explosive Coleman, K-State's first-year coach Lon Kruger turned to the talents of junior-college transfer Mitch Richmond and much-improved returnee Lance Simmons to provide the scoring punch.

Richmond, a transfer from Moberly (Mo.) Junior College, led the 'Cats by pouring in 31 points and going 13 of 20 from the field. Simmons, used sparingly last season by former Coach Jack Hartman, showed marked improvement by collecting 19 points.

K-State played sporadically throughout the course of the night. At one point early in the first half, K-State let a 14-point lead slip away as the Tankers rattled off nine consecutive points.

The persistent Army squad stuck with the Wildcats most of the night, but K-State was able to pull away in the closing minutes.

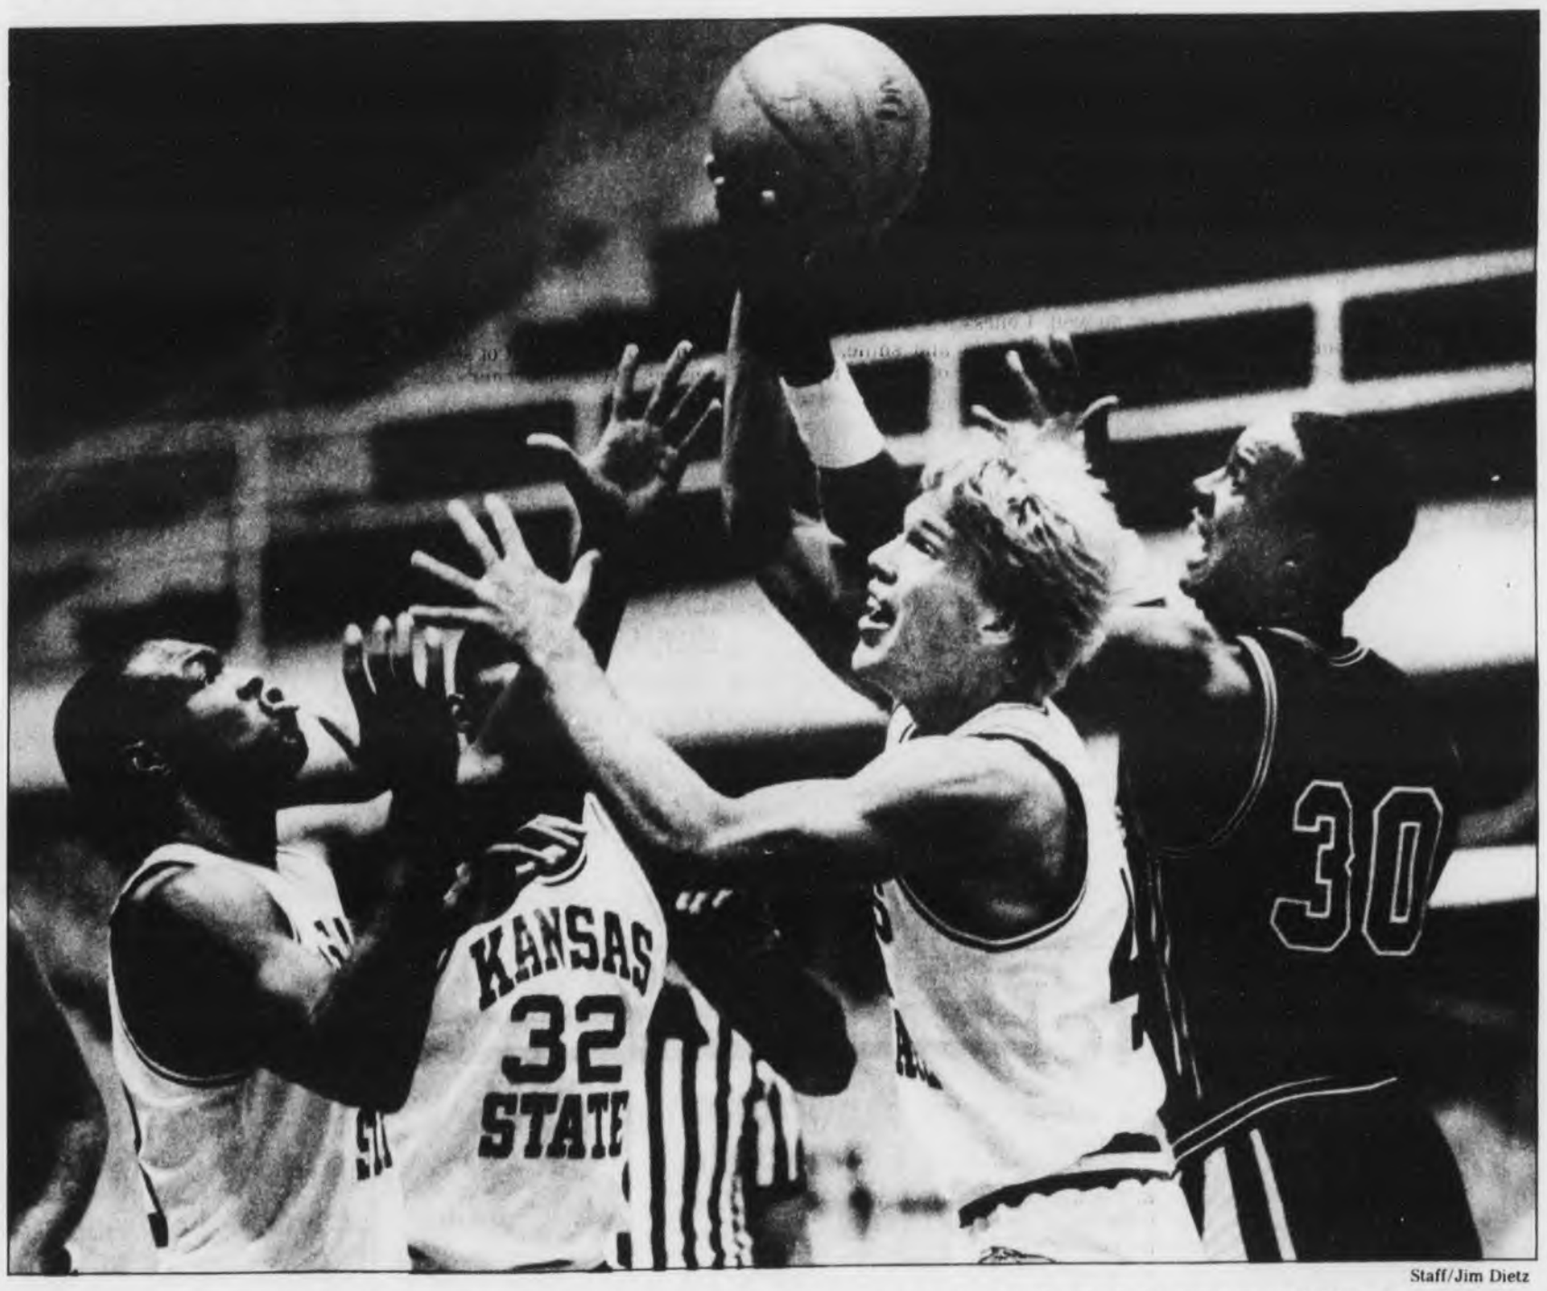
Kruger attributed his team's hot-and-cold performance to the fact he has only had one month to implement all the new offensive schemes.

"We only put in the press offense a few days ago, and we haven't even put in our zone offense yet. They played a little of that," he said. "It's a little disappointing, but when you play ball games this time of year, that can be expected and the kids are not all to blame."

Kruger said he was pleased to see his team score nearly 100 points, but he isn't emphasizing his Wildcats running up the point total.

"It didn't really matter to us, we just wanted to get more than the other folks did," he said.

Taking the floor with no one taller than 6-7 didn't stop the Wildcats from outrebounding the larger military team 46-35.



"When we knew our big guys were not able to play, we knew we would have to scrap more and want it more," said Richmond, who also claimed a game-high 11 rebounds and blocked four shots.

Fort Hood Coach Ron Foster entered the game with four of his regular starters suffering from the flu.

"(K-State) is probably one of the top-notch teams, as far as executing their offense as it should be executed, that we have seen this season," Foster said.

"Kansas State taught us some things," he added. "You can't take anything for granted and you can't take anyone lightly just because they list a lot of guys who are 6-5 or 6-4."

Other high scorers for the Wildcats were State Fair (Mo.) Junior College transfer William Scott, who scored 16 points and added a pair of three-point plays as the Wildcats pulled away in the end. K-State's second Moberly transfer, 6-7 Charles Bledsoe, contributed 14.

Broncos dump Chiefs to secure 2-game lead

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Running back Gerald Willhite scored three touchdowns, including a 70-yard punt return, and the Denver defense forced two Bill Kenney fumbles to set up quick first-quarter touchdowns as the Broncos whipped the Kansas City Chiefs 38-17 Sunday.

The victory raised the Broncos' record to 9-2 and increased their lead to two games over Kansas City and the Los Angeles Raiders, both 7-4, in the AFC West.

Denver used a variety of contributors to race to a 31-0 lead late in the first half. On Denver's first possession, Chris Norman faked a punt and fired a 43-yard touchdown pass to Steve Wilson.

With 6:02 left in the opening period, Bronco safety Randy Robbins, on a blitz, slammed into Kenney, the Chiefs' quarterback, and forced a fumble. Defensive end Andre Townsend returned the fumble seven yards for a TD.

On the next play from scrimmage, Denver linebacker Karl Mecklenburg sacked Kenney and produced another fumble, which nose tackle Tony Colorito recovered at the 1. Willhite scored on the following play for a 21-0 lead.

Willhite's punt return made it 28-0 midway through the second quarter, and the Broncos later tacked on a field goal.

Kansas City drew within 31-7 at intermission as Kenney drove the Chiefs 83 yards in seven plays, hitting Henry Marshall on a 15-yard TD throw.

The Chiefs threatened to make things interesting early in the third period. Kenney threw 27 yards to Carlos Carson for a TD after a blocked punt.

Two plays later, Denver running back Gene Lang fumbled, giving Kansas City possession at the Denver 34. But Bronco linebacker Ricky Hunley countered with an interception, setting up a 49-yard drive and Willhite's third score.

Lady Cats' morning session gives Mossman view of team

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

For a change in early morning eating habits, try the Lady Cats' breakfast menu. K-State's women's basketball team feasted on rebounds, base-line jumpers and layups at the purple and white scrimmage at Saturday morning in Ahearn Field House.

Both teams were plagued by turnovers and cold shooting from the floor in the game, which was divided into eight-minute quarters the first half and seven-minute periods the second half. But in the end, the elder purple sqaud — paced by seniors Sue Leiding and Susan Green — dumped the white team 49-39.

Leiding, a 6-foot-2 center from Tulsa, Okla., led all scorers with 14 points and Green, a 5-8 guard from Anthony, chipped in 10.

"Overall, I though the scrimmage went pretty well," K-State Coach Matilda Mossman said. "We weren't perfect, obviously, and I think that before our next scrimmage we need to work on our half-court set offense and try to cut down on our turnovers."

The purple squad shot only 42.2 percent from the field in the game, compared to the white sqaud's 43.2-percent mark. The white team turned the ball over 18 times and the purple team had 16 miscues.

Rita Matteucci, a 5-7 freshman guard from Albuquerque, N.M., paced the freshmen-laden white team with some hot outside shooting in the second half and finished with 11 points.

Amy Davidson and Stephanie Lane, also freshmen, contributed seven points apiece for the white team.

"As it worked out, most of the freshman were on the same team because I wanted to keep my seniors together, and I think on the whole the freshman did well," Mossman said. "I saw some evidence of some good outside shooting that we haven't seen here for awhile."

The white team only led once in the game, 2-1 with 7:25 left in the first quarter, and the purple squad went on to a 15-6 first-period lead behind the offensive performance of Carlisa Thomas, who had four of her six points in the opening stanza.

With eight unanswered points midway through the second period, the purple team built its lead to 27-10 before the white squad responded with three baskets to pull within 11 at the half.

The white team outscored the purple squad 23-22 in the second half, but the purple team kept its lead in the final minutes by converting seven-of-eight free-throw attempts. Overall, the purple team shot 11-of-14 (75.6 percent) from the charity stripe.

Thomas led both teams in rebounding with 10.

K-State will scrimmage Tuesday night at Newton High School before opening the 1986-87 campaign with the McCall Pattern Classic Nov. 28-29 in Ahearn.

Svensson's 3-set win shocks former champ

By The Collegian Staff

The women's tennis team ended the fall season on an upswing this weekend at the I.T.C.A. Regionals in Provo, Utah.

No. 1 singles player Lena Svensson upset 1985 Big Eight champion and '86 runner-up Kathleen Heckman of Colorado 3-6, 7-5, 6-4 Thursday to advance to the second round. The win, according to head coach Steve Bietau, was the biggest in Svensson's K-State career.

"The highlight of the tournament was Lena's victory over Heckman," Bietau said. "It is a big step for her. I have always told her she can win the Big Eight. This puts her one step closer."

In other first round action, No. 2 singles player Annika Emtell defeated Southwest Missouri State's Tracy Williams 6-1, 6-4. Kristy Line and Valerie Rive, however, dropped their opening-round matches. Line lost to J. Toomy of New Mexico 6-0, 6-1, while Rive suffered a 6-3, 6-2 loss to Carrie-Lynn Cohen of Oklahoma State.

Svensson and Emtell fell in the second round. Svensson was downed by Brigham Young's Sydney Fulford 6-0, 6-1, and Emtell was blanked by Renata Baranski of Oklahoma State 6-0, 6-0.

In consolation singles, Line fell to Sandra McGilvray of Oklahoma 6-4, 7-6, while Rive was downed by the Sooners' Bernadette Brennan 6-1, 6-1.

K-State faired poorly in the doubles competition as the teams of Rive-Line and Svensson-Emtell lost opening-round matches.

"Last year, we came out here and didn't compete well in any spots," Bietau said.

Brazilians cast votes in national election

By The Associated Press

BRASILIA, Brazil — Candidates from President Jose Sarney's centrist coalition led in major states, according to preliminary results Sunday in Brazil's first major election after 21 years of military rule.

About 45,000 candidates from 30 parties competed for 536 seats in the two-chamber National Congress and for governorships and legislative seats in 23 states. Congress will write a new constitution and determine, among other things, the date of the next presidential election.

More than 60 million of the approximately 69 million eligible voters balloted Saturday. Voting was mandatory.

Thousands of police were posted at polling places throughout Brazil. Police said about 300 people were arrested, mostly for engaging in political propaganda near polling sites.

First results were available Sunday in some urban centers, but the Supreme Electoral Tribunal said final results would not be ready for about a week.

In Rio de Janeiro, with an electorate of 6.2 million, more than 700,000 votes were counted. Wellington Moreira Franco, backed by Sarney's coalition, had 418,000 votes, compared to 277,000 for Lt. Gov. Darcy Ribeiro and 60,000 for Fernando Gabeira of the leftist Workers Party.

Ribeiro was backed by outgoing Gov. Leonel Brizola, leader of the socialist Democratic Labor Party.

Assad denies involvement in terrorism

By The Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria — President Hafez Assad denied that Syria was involved in terrorism and accused President Reagan and Britain's Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher on Sunday of being the "real terrorists" and trying to bully Syria.

"We are against terrorism, we don't practice it and do not allow anyone to hatch terrorist plots from our territory," Assad told about 7,000 people at a Damascus stadium on the 16th anniversary of the coup that brought him to power.

Assad said, however, that Syria backed "resistance against occupation and all national liberation movements."

The speech was interrupted by roars of approval. From time to time the president halted for a moment and the crowd shouted slogans such as "We are against terrorism! Zionists are the beasts of the jungle! Hafez is our leader!" and "America, the terrorists!"

Britain cut ties with Syria last month after a Jordanian, Nezar Hindawi, was convicted of working with Syrian diplomats in trying to plant a bomb on an Israeli airliner in London.

The United States announced Friday it would impose diplomatic and economic measures against the Damascus government, citing Syria's alleged support for terrorist groups.

Assad accused Israeli intelligence officials of planning the bombing and said he wished to express Syria's "astonishment" at Western measures against his country.

He said Reagan and Thatcher were "the real terrorists who practice state terrorism against the freedom of the people."

He cited as examples the U.S. invasion of Grenada, U.S support for Nicaraguan guerrillas and "British army practices" in Egypt and the rest of the Arab world during the 1950s.

"When they accuse Syria of terrorism, they want to terrorize and frighten Syria," Assad said. "Syria cannot be terrorized nor frightened into changing its national political course. Quite the contrary, Syria, if it wishes so, is the one who frightens and terrorizes."

"He who extends to us a friendly hand, we extend a friendly hand to him, but he who extends an evil hand, we extend to him a knife and we cut off his hand," Assad said.

He said his nation would be able to cope with the various measures imposed by Britain, the United States and the European Common Market.

"For the sake of our freedom and independent decision, we shall sacrifice whatever it might take," he said. "We shall give up lots of things if the nation so needs."

The United States tightened trade controls and banned commercial flights between Syria and America. The Common Market, with the exception of Greece, banned the sale of new arms to Syria, suspended high-level official visits and agreed to review the activities of their diplomats in Syria.

Assad thanked Greece for refusing to go along. He paid tribute to "the people of Greece and to Premier Andreas Papandreou for their noble and principled stand."

Assad said Syria faced economic difficulties, but blamed them on "the international economic crisis" and "the huge spending on defense to which the Israeli expansionist army is compelling us."

Trudeau's musical satire of Reagan fails to amuse Washington critics

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — "Doonesbury" cartoonist Garry Trudeau's musical satire of President Reagan has left few in the nation's capital laughing.

"Rap Master Ronnie" has played to sell-out audiences in Boston, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Chicago, but in the president's hometown the 196-seat house has been half full at best, said director-choreographer Bill Castellino.

After the show opened Oct. 15, television and newspaper reviews in Washington were uniformly negative, leaving the production to depend on word-of-mouth.

"What's the name of the show again?" said a woman who answered the telephone in the White House press secretary's office last week. "Did you say 'Rat' master Ronnie•'"

Trudeau, in a telephone interview from his New York home, said he hadn't read the Washington reviews, "but I figured sooner or later we were due."

The same week Washington reviewers were panning it, the show was getting critics awards in Chicago, he said, adding, "You can't get greedy."

But he conceded that Washington was "a nut we wanted to crack." It was "a little like doing a satire on GM in Detroit. It's like getting into the enemy camp."

The show opened in 1984 in New York and ran as an eight-week limited engagement immediately preceding the presidential election. After the election, it was rewritten and produced in other cities.

The show consists of 18 musical numbers tied together by Reagan impersonator Jim Morris, praised by a Washington critic for capturing the president's voice and mannerisms "right down to the blush on his apple-doll cheeks."

One of the favorite lines from the production comes during a mock press conference when reporters question the president's command of facts. The Reagan impersonator responds, "If you're right 90 percent of the time, why quibble about the remaining 3 percent?"

The musical numbers take pokes at the invasion of Grenada, the bombing of Libya, the Moral Majority, yuppies, and the Reagan administration's approach to Soviet relations, civil rights, welfare programs and drugs.

Producer Tom Kemp said he was disappointed the production didn't get financial support from Reagan critics in Washington, particularly liberal Democrats.

"It probably just got lost in the election cycle," said Terry Michael, press spokesman for the Democratic National Committee, who noted that official Washington was involved with national elections during the first three weeks of the production.

Others suggested that the show's slack sales were due to Washingtonians' lack of humor.

"People take themselves and their jobs so incredibly seriously in Washington," said Washington-based writer Susan Trausch, who writes a humor column for The Boston Globe and whose book "It Came From the Swamp" pokes fun at the national's capital. "If you laugh, you reveal something about yourself. There is a wall here that I've never encountered anywhere else.

"The irony is that Reagan would probably think it (the revue) was funny."

Coleman Co. activities to celebrate production of 40 millionth lantern

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Had W.C. Coleman been discouraged by his first abortive attempt to sell gasoline lamps, the Coleman Co. and its famous lantern might never have existed.

The Wichita company celebrates the production of its 40 millionth lantern today with a day full of activities including the presentation of gold-plated lanterns to company executives.

Coleman saw his first pressure-fed woven mantle liquid fuel lamp in an Alabama drugstore. Its brilliant light was remarkable in an age of smoky wick-type oil lamps, flickering gas lights and the dim glow from carbon filament electric lights.

With a stock of 16 lamps from a Memphis, Tenn., company, Coleman arrived in Kingfisher, Okla., on Jan. 1, 1900, with high hopes. He sold only two lamps. A peddler hawking inferior gravity-fed lamps had made merchants wary. They had carbon-encrusted non-working lamps bought from that salesman piled in their storerooms. They wanted nothing to do with Coleman despite his claims his lamps were different.

Deciding to sell what his lamps could do rather than the lamps themselves, Coleman went back to the merchants and offered them lighting service. He charged $1 per week per lamp and provided fuel and maintenance as part of the deal. If the lamps didn't work, the customers didn't have to pay.

Coleman soon installed his 14 remaining lamps and took orders for 100 more.

He borrowed $2,000 to keep up with demand.

"I started this business on a shoestring and I borrowed the shoestring," Coleman was fond of saying.

Table lamps, lighting systems and cooking ranges followed. The first Coleman lantern, destined to become a favorite of farmers, outdoorsmen and others, was produced in 1914 in a Wichita plant that employed a handful of people. The company has operations today at 32 locations worldwide. It employs nearly 5,000 people, about 2,000 of them in Wichita. Items it produces are sold in more than 100 countries.

About 70 percent of the company's current business is in the outing products field. It still offers many models of lanterns, stoves and burners, but the product line has been expanded to include tents, sleeping bags, coolers, jugs, boats, skis, airguns, knives, archery equipment and other items.

Many of the new products are produced by companies Coleman has acquired. When the new units are taken into the fold, they face a tough standard.

"We either gain a position of profitable leadership in a relatively short time or get out of that business. That leaves us only in businesses where we have or are in the position of gaining a leadership position," said Sheldon Coleman, son of the late W.C. Coleman and chairman of the company's board.

"It also has been important to target markets intelligently," he said. "We seek opportunities to put our experience and knowledge to good use in acquired companies whose products, people and philosophies blend well with ours."

It was Sheldon Coleman who provided the direction that salvaged the company after its first losing year in 1930. Caught with huge inventories when the Great Depression started, the company was squeezed because its traditional base of rural customers didn't have much money to spend. Coleman needed new products. Sheldon Coleman suggested oil heaters and gas floor furnaces. By 1932 the company was sound once more.

After its only other losing year, 1957, Sheldon Coleman again played a major role by deciding to divisionalize operations. By forming separate groups that manufactured specific parts of the product line, Coleman streamlined manufacturing and management and poised the company for a decade of phenomenal growth.

During the 1960s, the Coleman Co. quadrupled its sales and earnings. Sheldon Coleman thinks the economic conditions that allowed the company to perform that well are present again today.

After a disappointing year in 1985, he has dubbed 1986 "the year of the great turnaround" and 1987 "the year of the great surge." He has set a goal of $1 billion in sales by 1990.

In 1985, sales fell 3 percent from the previous year to $442.7 million. Earnings declined 38 percent to $10.1 million or $1.46 a share compared with $16.2 million or $2.37 a share in 1984. A 15 percent increase in sales was expected during 1986 with earnings growing even faster, Coleman said.

The companies' financial picture may not be the only thing changing soon. Coleman, though he will remain as board chairman, may vacate the office of the chief executive that he shares with two other top company officials. At 85, Coleman still is physically active and mentally sharp, but he prefers to let his son, who now runs the outing products division, take over most of his duties.

Though his sight and hearing have deteriorated slightly, Coleman's only other physical problem is a tender right knee acquired when he stepped in a gopher hole and tore tendons while backpacking 10 years ago. He works out several days a week and has a blood pressure, 120-80, better than many men half his age.

"I still play tennis, but I don't play very good mainly because I say to my body 'Move!' but instead of paying real quick sharp attention to me it says 'Wait a minute. Let's think this over before we move,' " he said.

Bomb explosion causes damage to IBM center in West Germany

By The Associated Press

HEIDELBERG, West Germany — A bomb explosion heavily damaged an International Business Machines Corp. research center on Sunday, but caused no casualties, police said. Leftist terrorists claimed responsibility.

The bomb erupted at about 4 a.m. and damaged the facade of the four-story building and equipment inside, officials said. West German televison said the homemade device was placed on a second-floor balcony.

Police said it would take days to estimate the damage.

Shortly before the blast, anonymous callers told two Heidelberg pastors to warn the night watchman to leave the building, said Hans-Juergen Foerster, a spokesman for the federal prosecutor's office.

Both pastors immediately contacted police, who informed the watchman, Foerster said.

He said by the time police arrived at the U.S. company's research facility in an industrial section of Heidelberg, the bomb had gone off. He said police saw a car speeding away.

In a letter found nearby, a group calling itself the Hind Alameh Fighting Cell claimed responsibility for the attack, Foerster said.

Hind Alameh, a member of the Red Army Faction terrorist group, was killed in a 1977 airliner hijacking.

"We are going on the assumption that those behind this (attack) can be found among the hard core activists from the RAF," Foerster said.

The letter demanded that imprisoned RAF member Guenter Sonnenberg be freed and called on authorities to allow all jailed RAF members to be housed in the same area.

The RAF has long held that its members are political prisoners and should be held together, apart from other inmates.

Review

Constance, played by Kelly Wondra, graduate student in speech, is a woman of great intelligence with not much outlet for it. Wondra gives a fine performance, showing a woman of both stamina and wisdom as she stands up to each of her opponents. She delivers her lines from deep inside her character and is graceful even when she is angry.

John, played by Mark Cross, sophomore in theater, is just the kind of upstanding individual who would foolishly assume he was beyond suspicion. Cross, who seemed a bit insincere in the first two rounds, came in with a fresh wind in round 3 and was truly superb. Forced to recognize Constance as an independent woman when she tells him she's taking six weeks' holiday with an old flame, he becomes positively catty. Cross plays this to the hilt and is funny — and quite charming.

The old flame, Bernard Kersal, is played by Erik Bruce, freshman in theater. Bernard, who's come to England from China to stay for a year, is still madly in love with Constance after 15 years apart. He stands by her, confessing undying devotion as she tells him calmly that she is grateful, but much too devoted to her husband to consider an affair.

Bruce gives an acceptable performance as Bernard, but his character behaves somewhat like an annoying dog.

Tamara Grothaus, freshman in music, is fitting as the somewhat daft mistress Marie-Louise. She brings a Betty Boop quality to the character, with a wide-eyed gaze and puckered red lips.

The character most enjoyable to watch is the butler, Bentley, played by Victor Force, graduate student in speech. Force's performance proves that the small role is often the gem — for the audience as well as the actor. Those in attendance are well advised to watch every move he makes, and this includes his activity during the two intermissions.

Mortimer Durham, enraged husband of Marie-Louise, is portrayed in a frenzy by Scott Kelly, senior in theater. Though only on stage for a short time (to expose the lovers), he certainly stirs things up. Kelly masters a man out of control with ease, whether he's aware of it or not.

"The Constant Wife," presented by the K-State Players and the Department of Speech, will resume performances in Nichols Hall Theatre at 8 p.m. Wednesday through Saturday.

Hasenfus

Hasenfus and five other captives.

The sentence handed down Saturday by the three-member People's Tribunal includes the maximum 30 years in prison for violating the maintenance of order and public security and the maximum three years for criminal association, with the sentences to be served concurrently.

The 30 years also includes an unspecified sentence on a charge of terrorism, which carries a maximum two-year penalty.

Hasenfus was the lone survivor when Sandinista forces in southern Nicaragua on Oct. 2 shot down a C-123 plane he said was carrying small arms and ammunition to U.S.-backed rebels.

The American pilot and co-pilot and a Nicaraguan radio man were killed. Hasenfus was captured a day later, after parachuting from the burning aircraft.

Hasenfus on Saturday told the court he wanted to appeal the sentence. His Nicaraguan attorney, Enrique Sotelo Borgen, said after the sentencing that he did not know if he would appeal.

Presidential spokesman Manuel Espinoza said Sunday that for the time being, Hasenfus will not be allowed to give interviews.

In Washington, a White House spokesman, Donald Mathes, said Saturday, "The outcome was decided before the trial even started. It served no purpose other than to make propaganda."

State Department spokesman Pete Martinez said, "The Nicaraguan government's treatment of Mr. Hasenfus violated many of his basic due process rights under both international and Nicaraguan law."

Asbestos

remove the asbestos off both ceilings in Edwards Hall."

The Department of Housing finances asbestos removal through its maintenance budget, which comes from student rental fees, he said.

Lambert, the K-State director of public safety, said there are long-range plans to remove asbestos in buildings on campus, but added that there is a lack of money for asbestos removal.

"Asbestos is in buildings all over campus. When it is not damaged or airborne, it is not a problem," Lambert said.

Wiley said there is no need to remove asbestos unless it is considered in a dangerous condition of possibly entering the air.

"If there is no chance for the asbestos to become airborne, there is probably less risk in leaving it," Moody said. "However, whether it should be removed depends on the circumstances of each situation."

"I'm not going to say it is safer not to remove it," Wiley said. "If we don't remove it and it is encapsulated, there is not any fibers moving in the air. But when we remove it, the procedure we follow is perfectly safe. We take all precautions."

Wiley said a hygienist was present at all times with the contractor to monitor the air and insure that the correct procedure for following state guidelines was enforced.

The hygienist checked the percentage of fibers in the air and remained to check the air until two hours after the job was completed, Wiley said. He added that the hygienist found no detectable asbestos in the air.

"We have been checked by the state regulators and have been found in complete compliance in all areas containing asbestos," he said.

Heart pump patient dies

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The first patient at St. Francis Regional Medical Center to be connected to a new heart pump died this weekend from liver and kidney failures, a hospital spokesman said.

The 73-year-old man, whose name was withheld at his family's request, died at 11:05 a.m. Saturday, two and a half days after being connected to the Ventricular Assist Device, said Larry Baker, director of public relations.

The machine helps pump blood through ventricles too damaged or weak to work independently.

Baker said that because the patient's organ failure was not related directly to the heart, confidence in the VAD was not diminished by his death.

Shultz

holding our hostages, I would certainly say, as far as I'm concerned, no." He said, however, he did not speak for the entire administration.

Explaining why earlier this fall he told representatives of moderate Arab states that the United States was not sending arms to Iran, Shultz said "my own information about the operational aspects of what was going on was fragmentary at best."

He also said U.S. policy on arms shipments remains intact "and there hasn't been any flood of U.S. arms to Iran ... as far as I understand."

Poindexter, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," did not say specifically that no more arms would be shipped to Iran, but said, "The arms embargo still continues. We do not feel it in our national interest to allow the floodgates to be thrown open to allow arms to be shipped (to Iran)."

"We still list Iran as a state that sponsors terrorism," he said. "However, the fact remains that the moderate elements that we were talking to, we think, did have some impact on stopping the hostage-taking in Lebanon for about a year."

He said the chance for the release of any more of the five Americans still held in Lebanon may have been damaged by recent disclosures.

The administration denies that the arms shipments were in exchange for the release of David Jacobsen two weeks ago. The same group that held Jacobsen still holds Terry Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for The Associated Press, and Thomas Sutherland, dean of American University in Beirut. At least three other hostages are held by another group or groups that may not have Iranian ties.

Byrd, interviewed on ABC's "This Week with David Brinkley," urged the administration to declare publicly an end to arms shipments to Iran.

"The important thing is for the president to move as quickly as he can to repair the damage," Byrd said. "One is to state publicly and act unequivocally to stop arms shipments to not only Iran but to any terrorist state."

Rep. Jim Wright, D-Texas, House Democratic leader interviewed on the CBS program, said "it appears that laws have been broken" with the arms deal. He said U.S. laws forbid arms shipments to terrorist countries, including Iran, and require the administration to inform Congress of covert actions.

ed forces chief of staff, said on Sunday that Olalia's killing should not be "aggravated by hate and reddened with further bloodshed."

Presidential spokesman Teodoro Benigno announced Sunday what he said were important leads in the killing. Olalia's body was found last Thursday off a highway in northeastern Manila.

Benigno said police have pieced together a composite picture of one of five men seen near Olalia's home before his disappearance Wednesday. Three vehicles used by the five have also been identified.

Aquino came to power last February in a civilian-military revolt that overthrew President Ferdinand E. Marcos, who fled to Hawaii. Enrile and Ramos, who had both served under Marcos, helped lead the revolt.

Student lobbyists strive for power to allocate funds

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Associated Students of Kansas, which represents student governments at six state universities, said Monday its top priority in the 1987 legislative session will be to win authority for the schools to spend additional tuition income generated by enrollment increases.

The organization's other top legislative goals, as decided at a policy committee meeting here Sunday, are to modify the university funding formula to minimize the impact of enrollment gains and losses, and formalize in law a state work-study program now in operation and provide more state money for it.

ASK's legislative program was outlined at a Statehouse news conference Monday by Christine Graves, its executive director.

Many of the group's proposals — including proposed 8 percent salary increases for university faculty and 8 percent increases in student salaries for on-campus employment — will cost money.

"ASK student leaders are not blind to the serious financial problems facing the state," Graves said. "The students believe the priorities we have selected are prudent, responsible positions which take into account the limitation of state resources."

The Kansas Board of Regents has endorsed the 8 percent faculty and student salary increases, and ASK supports its position on those two money issues. The Regents also are seeking a 1 percent increase in retirement benefits for faculty members, and ASK backed that request as well.

"Students see first hand the widening cracks in our higher education foundation," Graves said. "They see top faculty members leaving their institutions for better paying positions elsewhere.

"They have to deal with aging equipment, reduced library resources and shortened hours, and cutbacks in services and materials all through the university. These circumstances weaken the quality of education for Kansas students.

"Student leaders are deeply concerned with the impression of many top students that Kansas universities are 'second rate' — second choices if aid package from out-of-state schools fall through."

She said ASK was making release of extra tuition income its first priority because that would not cost the state treasury any money.

"These fees would be available for the cur-

Planning board studies possible rules, zoning for track construction

By TOM SCHULTES
Business/Government Editor

Although the state hasn't finalized legislation regarding construction of horse and dog racing tracks, members of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board aren't willing to be left at the starting gate.

At Monday night's meeting, board members discussed zoning regulations pertaining to the location and construction of race tracks.

Board member Richard Hayter said he would prefer to get regulations in line to avoid possible delays after the Legislature decides the requirements. He said delays could force track developers to go to other communities.

Jim Wood, owner of Manhattan Raceway Park located west of Manhattan, said he was considering such a facility near the racetrack, but noted the existing road and design may not be suitable. He said the county could realize income through sales taxes on concessions and gate receipts for spectators, but not for trainers or handlers of the animals.

Steve Zilkie, project manager for the city, presented a list of zoning regulations in four cities with horse race tracks. The cities reviewed were Hot Springs, Ark.; Shreveport, La.; and Omaha and Lincoln, Neb.

In Hot Springs, tracks are allowed as a conditional use in tourist-commercial zones.

In Shreveport, tracks are allowed as conditional uses in residential/agricultural; light industrial and commercial/business zones. Tracks are also allowed as permitted uses in heavy industrial zones.

Becky Riden, senior in architecture, looks over her project before adding more detail to her design project. The architecture students are often up long nights working on projects and assignments and say it gives them more time for concentrated work.

Late nights exhausting for students

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

With empty coffee cups and a multitude of architectural supplies cluttering his drawing table, an architecture student stretches in an attempt to relieve the fatigue and stress that have overcome his body.

Glancing at the clock, he realizes morning is approaching and soon his project will be due.

For most architecture students, this scene is not so unusual. It is not uncommon for a student to spend at least one "all-nighter" per project, said Ron Hess, head of the Department of Architecture.

"It's hard for me to get into a project during the day, because my studio is set up two hours at a time," said Adrienne Downey, senior in landscape architecture. "I need a long span of time to really get into it. I do the little things during the day and hit it hard at night."

Because a new project begins as soon as the previous project ends, students often "blow it off" — meaning they have to cram at the end — instead of pacing themselves, said Becky Riden, senior in architecture.

"That's when you begin pulling all-nighters," she said.

Riden said the time an architecture student spends in studio is no different than any other student's time in class or studying.

"Architecture classes can be compared to normal classes — where you go to a lecture and do the reading and homework out of class. We (architect students) just draw out of class," she said.

But Riden said time management is just as much of a problem for the student of architecture as it is for any other major.

"Balancing classes is tough," she said. "You have to keep on top of it all to be successful. One has to have a drive for architecture."

"My grades are mediocre because I do other activities," Downey said. "The students that are in there constantly — every weekend — are getting the As."

Downey said the work she produces often depends on the amount of time available.

"I like the work I'm doing as long as I understand it and have time to do it," Downey said. "But I don't like being there endless hours at night.

"The amount of detail work depends on what you're working on. We are taught to work fast," Downey said. "When you're in a hurry, you are in total concentration and you are really 'jamming.' Sometimes this is when you come out with some of your

K-State women say peers, school primary sex-information sources

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

Most contemporary college women did not receive much sexual information from their parents, and 67 percent feel their sexual attitudes are more permissive than their parents', according to a University study released this weekend.

Sources of sexual attitudes and information were the focus of the study conducted by Betsy Bergen, associate professor of human development and family studies. Bergen surveyed 111 single K-State female student volunteers last December. She presented the results in St. Louis at the annual meeting of the Society for the Scientific Study of Sex.

"It really came up that the impact of the family on sexuality could be summed up in two words — not much," Bergen said. "Mothers were listed only twice as the most important sources of information. Fathers were never listed."

The questionnaire asked where the women learned about 35 sexual items, including pregnancy, male and female anatomies and sexual intercourse. Eighteen choices of information sources were given, with mother, father, sister, media and school as possible responses.

"Actually, peers and school classes were more often listed as important sources of information than parents. Most (respondents) indicated that sex was not discussed in their homes. One said the only time sex was mentioned was when it came on TV, and then it was time to turn the channel," Bergen said.

"Those were typical of the comments, and if kids are making those kinds of statements, then obviously they perceive they're not getting information from their parents," she said.

Bergen said a possible reason for lack of parental information is that most parents have not had sex education classes and may be too embarrassed to discuss the subject.

Sexual attitudes among the respondents show about three-fourths think their attitudes differ from those of their parents. About 66 percent of the women believe in sex before marriage when there is affection in a relationship, while 23 percent believe in abstinence.

However, 67 percent said their mothers were against premarital sex, and 26 percent thought their mothers would accept sex before marriage as long as affection was part of the relationship.

"They're saying 'We have not adopted the attitudes and values we believe (our parents) hold,'" Bergen said. "Of course, what they believe their parents believe may not be what they really believe."

About 22 percent of the women said their sexual attitudes were influenced by their parents. A larger number — 28 percent — felt their attitudes about sexual issues were similar to their mothers' beliefs.

"If you believe that your mother believes in abstinence, and you believe in permissiveness with affection, then you really don't hold the same values as your mother," Bergen said.

"An interesting fact that needs to be a part of it is that three-

Ramada Inn to change ownership; Foundation signs 50-year contract

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Beginning Dec. 1, the Ramada Inn will become the University Inn.

Under a contract signed Monday, ownership of the 20-year-old facility was transferred from University Facilities Inc. to Kansas State Partners Inc., a corporation owned by two Atlanta-based firms specializing in developing hotels and conference complexes.

The announcement was made at a press conference Monday at the Ramada Inn, 17th Street and Anderson Avenue.

A division of the Marriott Corp. is to be hired by the new owners to oversee the facility, said William Reed, owner of the William Reed Co. and co-owner of Kansas State Partners Inc.

In addition, a pact with the College of Human Ecology will allow the development of a hotel and restaurant management curriculum utilizing the facility.

"Today we've completed the major portion of the legal work necessary for us to assume ownership of the hotel on Dec. 1," Reed said. "At that time, the hotel will be managed by Marriott's Conference Center Management Division."

The Marriott Corp. created the division in 1977 to manage facilities solely for corporate and university users, Reed said.

Plans are being discussed for expansion and development of the facility, he said, but would not comment on specifics.

Calling the project "an ongoing evolutionary process," KSU Foundation President Art Loub said a point has been reached where "greater expectations must be met in the area of conference facilities, room availability and the University's hotel and restaurant management program."

Loub said Foundation officials met many times during the past six months with representatives of the William Reed Co., Marriott officials and University administrators.

The contract between the Foundation and Kansas State Partners Inc. will "cement the relationship for the next 50 years," he said.

Under the former contract, negotiated only five years ago, the KSU Foundation was to have become sole owner of the Ramada Inn in the year 2001, Loub said.

"With this action, that agreement obviously is null and void," he said.

Although the new agreement will be "more profitable" to the Foundation, Loub declined to say to what extent.

"We receive a basic ground lease, and then there are some escalator arrangements," he said.

The Marriott Corp. will assist in providing "realistic training environments" for the hotel and restaurant management instructional program, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

The enhanced capability to handle conferences and the hotel and restaurant management program will "contribute substantially to the economy of the region and the state," he said.

Expansion of the hotel and restaurant management program must be approved by the Kansas Board of Regents, he said.

If approved, resident students participating in the new program will have access to practical experience with a corporation, said Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology.

Undergraduate enrollment in the curriculum is expected to increase from 50 to 250 during the next four years, she said.

The proposed expansion plan will

Diplomat says Korean leader alive

PEKING — A diplomat contacted in Pyongyang said today that North Korean President Kim Il Sung was in "absolutely good health" when he greeted an arriving Mongolian delegation at the Pyongyang airport.

The Asian diplomat, contacted by telephone by The Associated Press office in Peking, said, "The president was there and he is in absolutely good health."

"There seems to be nothing correct about these reports (Sunday from South Korea that Kim had been killed or deposed)" the diplomat said. "It is absolutely normal, there is nothing wrong, he is absolutely normal, he is in good health."

The diplomat spoke with the condition he not be identified by name or nationality.

He was asked about a report by the South Korean Defense Ministry as saying loudspeakers along the North Korean side of the demilitarized zone reported that Kim had been removed in a coup led by North Korean Defense Minister O Jin U.

The diplomat said he did not see O or Kim's son and heir apparent, Kim Jong Il, at the airport ceremony in the North Korean capital.

"Everything is normal, there is nothing wrong, there are no signs of mourning, the president is alive in excellent health," the diplomat said.

Reagan plans no Iranian arms sale

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said Monday he has "absolutely no plans" to send more arms to Iran, although his spokesman said the president's authorization for the weapons shipments technically remains in effect.

As he posed for pictures at the start of a meeting with Argentine President Raul Alfonsin, Reagan was asked if there would be more U.S. arms shipments to Iran like those he confirmed last week after numerous published reports of secret U.S.-Iranian dealings.

"We have absolutely no plans to do any such thing," Reagan told reporters. Nor, he said, would he be firing Secretary of State George Shultz or any other top foreign policy advisers as a result of public controversy over the covert operation.

Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes, meanwhile, said Reagan had told him there would be no further arms shipments but that the "intelligence finding," a Jan. 17 document authorizing the weapons and spare parts sales, is technically "still in effect" because it carried no time limit and has not been rescinded.

The spokesman also said the Iranians paid cash for the military supplies they received under Reagan's order, although neither the amount nor the precise weaponry supplied has been disclosed.

The Iranians long have been seeking a variety of weapons and spare parts for their U.S.-made planes and equipment ordered and paid for during the reign of the Shah of Iran, but whose delivery was blocked when the U.S. Embassy in Tehran was seized and Americans were taken hostage.

Government offers aid to farmers

WASHINGTON — Federal disaster aid will be offered to farmers in four Kansas counties to help them recover from losses from storm damage last spring, it was announced Monday.

The Farmers Home Administration will make available low-interest loans to eligible producers in Comanche, Barber, Clark and Kiowa counties, according to Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan.

Farmers who suffered crop losses of at least 30 percent and unable to obtain credit from other sources can receive loans of up to $500,000. The loans carry a 5 percent interest rate on the first $100,000 borrowed and 8 percent on the remainder.

Dole said the aid is for losses caused by a storm with high winds and hail that hit the area on May 16.

AT&T announces extra rate cuts

WASHINGTON — AT&T announced on Monday long-distance rate cuts averaging 8.1 percent as of Jan. 1.

Long-distance customers of AT&T will save an estimated 11.6 percent on daytime calls, 6.2 percent on evening calls and 2.7 percent less on calls after 11 p.m.

Different percentage reductions will apply for business services such as toll-free 800 service. Callers with a high volume of calls to overseas locations will also get new discounts.

The rate cuts, the second round this year, will save customers $1.2 billion a year if the rates are approved by the Federal Communications Commission.

FCC Chairman Mark S. Fowler, who was in Phoenix, Ariz., attending a convention of state regulators, said he was pleased with the news.

A 9.5 percent rate cut, announced last April, went into effect on June 1 and was calculated to save AT&T customers $2 billion, the largest long-distance rate drop in history.

AT&T's prime competitors, MCI and US Sprint, reduced their rates later in the summer. The spread between AT&T rates and those of its competitors has been shrinking.

Spokesmen for both MCI and US Sprint said they had not seen the newest rate schedule. They have said their companies would remain competitive.

While AT&T rates are regulated by the federal government, competitors can put new rates into effect at any time.

NASA plans next shuttle mission

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Astronauts will board a space shuttle Tuesday for the first time since the Challenger accident for a practice countdown that will help launch teams maintain proficiency during a long flightless period.

Five veteran space travelers will settle into the cabin of Atlantis, perched on launch pad 39B, for the final two hours of a rehearsal that will end with simulated ignition of the main engines.

On Thursday, a team of seven rookie astronauts will board Atlantis to participate in an emergency crew escape exercise.

The drills will conclude seven weeks of launch pad tests for Atlantis, which will be moved back to a hangar on Saturday.

The exercises mark the last chance that astronauts and launch teams will have to sharpen their skills with a shuttle on the pad until Discovery is rolled out of storage to be readied for the next shuttle launch, now set for Feb. 18, 1988.

The three remaining shuttles have been grounded since Challenger exploded 73 seconds after liftoff last Jan. 28, killing the crew of seven. A faulty joint between segments of a solid fuel booster rocket that caused the accident is being redesigned.

The tests provide "a chance for a morale boost right in the center of this letdown, and there has been a letdown," said Conrad Nagel, NASA director of shuttle flow operations.

The five astronauts who board Atlantis on Tuesday will be the same ones who flew the last successful shuttle mission, that of Columbia, which ended just 10 days before the Challenger tragedy.

Project to cost locals more money

WASHINGTON — President Reagan on Monday signed a $16.3 billion water projects bill requiring states and local governments to pay a higher share for the popular projects.

The Water Resources Development Act of 1986, the first omnibus waterworks measure in 16 years, authorizes 300 Army Corps of Engineers projects across the nation.

The projects include development of ports and inland waterways, as well as flood control, erosion protection and other conservation measures.

The act forces state and local governments to pay an average 25 percent of project costs.

Farrell opens original music collections

Holdings include rare compositions

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

Three music collections are or will soon be accessible to students, said John Vander Velde, special collections librarian of Farrell Library.

The Jerry Wexler Music Collection and the Gail Kubik Manuscripts have yet to be processed, Vander Velde said, but the Stratton Music Collection is currently accessible.

The collections — including sound recordings, manuscripts and original books about music — are rare and "very diverse," he said.

The Jerry Wexler Music Collection consists of Atlantic Records albums that Wexler collected in the late '60s and early '70s, he said.

"This is Wexler's personal collection," Vander Velde said. "There is a lot of jazz, and rhythm and blues."

Wexler, known to some as "the Godfather of Rhythm and Blues," graduated from K-State in 1946 with a degree in industrial journalism.

It was while working for Billboard magazine in the late '40s that Wexler coined the term "rhythm and blues" to replace the term "race music," used to decribe recordings by black artists.

He joined Atlantic Records in 1953, and during his 22-year career with the company he produced the sounds of Aretha Franklin, Ray Charles, Solomon Burke and Wilson Pickett, among others.

Last spring, Wexler returned to K-State to accept his nomination as an Alumni Fellow.

Ellie Marsh, library assistant in the audio-visual collection department, said the Wexler collection not only contains his personal albums, but also those arriving as a result of his request of the record company.

Marsh said the University libraries began acquiring the Atlantic albums after Wexler's visit.

"He was interested in seeing the Atlantics," she said. "When I showed him what few we had, he said, 'I'll send you more.'"

Marsh said she was "ecstatic" about the collection.

"I think it's exciting when someone makes a contribution to the University and then returns to do it again in a different way," Marsh said.

Another collection that arrived about the same time as the Wexler collection was one belonging to Kubik, a Pulitzer Prize-winning composer born and raised in Coffeyville.

Kubik was a composer-in-residence at K-State in 1969-70, Vander Velde said. During his stay, he composed a large choral work performed at the dedication of McCain Auditorium.

"Kubik had a long and illustrious career as a composer," he said.

Vander Velde said the composer collected original music scores and unpublished manuscripts until his death in 1984.

Kubik's will directed that the collection be left to the Library of Congress.

However, Kubik's brother, who was executor of his estate, turned the collection over to K-State because of the Kubik family's "strong ties to Kansas," Vander Velde said.

The Kubik collection also includes books from his personal library.

"In the future, we will be getting tape recordings and correspondence as well," Vander Velde said.

But the oldest and most expanded collection is the Stratton Music Collection, said Carolyn Smith, reference librarian in charge of music.

Charles Stratton, a professor in the Department of Music from 1927 to 1964, was a collector of music and books about music, Smith said.

"Stratton loved to travel, and he bought music wherever he went," she said.

Upon his death a few years after he retired from the department, the University libraries acquired his collection.

Vander Velde said the Stratton collection includes all forms of music — early English opera, hymnology (hymn books), history books and a number of limited editions of music scores.

"It is an eclectic collection," Vander Velde said, containing more than 1,000 items.

"There are all kinds: books on musical forms, biographies and a number of truly rare books — first editions of monumental works in music," Vander Velde said. "One book even has in it the handwriting of Felix Mendelssohn."

Of the 1,000 items in the collection, about 90 have a pre-1800 imprint, Smith said.

One of the highlights of the collection is five volumes of the famous composer, George Frederick Handel.

"We may be the only University that has all five volumes," she said.

Vander Velde said a visiting professor took slides of a rare book to be used in a concert at Kenyon College, a private liberal arts school in Ohio.

"I think we're pretty fortunate here at K-State (to have this kind of material)," he said.

Vander Velde said mostly graduate students and professors use the materials in special collections. The materials are mostly for research and some are written in foreign languages, he said.

Although materials cannot be checked out and browsing is not allowed, a staff member will find the requested item and it may be examined in a designated room, Vander Velde said.

When asked what brings students to the special collections room, Vander Velde said. "It depends on what they're interested in.

"This is original research material," he said, "and it's very rare. They can find out about the past to help them make inferences."

Pulitzer Prize winner to speak Wednesday

By The Collegian Staff

Jules Feiffer, Pulitzer Prize-winning cartoonist, will speak Wednesday at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium for the University's third convocation lecture this semester.

Feiffer, who originally wrote for the Village Voice, a New York publication, started as a "social satirist of lifestyles with an emphasis on the foibles of the young," said Robert Daly, associate professor of journalism and mass communications. Daly said Feiffer's emphasis shifted to political cartoons in the late '60s.

In 1958, Feiffer was hired by Playboy magazine for $500 a month which was "quite a bit back then," Daly said. Feiffer was known for his liberal approach to sex when sex was not a subject spoken of openly.

"Not a great artist (in the literal sense)," Daly said, "Feiffer has a masterful approach to social and political issues that bring out a feeling of outrage toward things that need to be changed."

Recipient of the Pulitzer Prize this year, Feiffer has long been acknowledged as one of America's foremost editorial cartoonists.

Feiffer is also an Academy Award winning filmmaker, an Obie winning playwright, and a "sharp, satirical writer who aims at people who need it," said Joe Unekis, associate professor of political science.

Events highlight Goodnow anniversary

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

In celebration of its 125th anniversary, the staff of the Goodnow House Museum, 2301 Claflin Road, has planned a series of events beginning Nov. 30 and continuing through December.

"If there had been no Goodnow, there would have been no K-State," said Kathleen Herndon, curator of the museum. The anniversary marks the date of Isaac T. Goodnow's purchase of land upon which K-State is built, the construction of his house which is now the museum and a tribute to Goodnow as a man who accomplished much for education in Kansas.

Goodnow and his wife, Ellen, came to Kansas in 1855, Herndon said. He had worked as the professor of natural sciences at the Wesleyan Academy in Wilberham, Mass., and Providence Seminary in East Greenwich, R.I. As an opponent of slavery, Goodnow resigned from his job and moved to a township called Boston, Kan., later renamed Manhattan.

Goodnow was always involved in local and territorial matters and was a believer in higher education, she said. He succeeded in helping to purchase land, build and open Bluemont Central College in 1860, Herndon said.

He then succeeded in convincing the Legislature to accept Bluemont as the center for the new Kansas State Agricultural College in 1861. Thus began K-State.

The only part of the original Bluemont College building still existing today is an arch that was built over a window in the building, Herndon said. The arch has "1859 Bluemont College" carved in it and is now a part of a wall in the old section of Farrell Library. The Bluemont College building was originally on the site where the K-State bull barns are today, she said.

The special events have been scheduled to add to the celebration. On Nov. 30, there will be an open house from 1 to 5 p.m. The musical group Woodwinds Anonymous will perform from 2 to 3 p.m.

The Royal Nonesuch Ensemble will perform from 2 to 3 p.m. on Dec. 7, and an Irish band called The Life of Riley will perform from 1 to 2 p.m. on Dec. 14. A gift shop will also be open with arts and crafts made by local artists.

The museum was accepted by the state in 1969 and was registered as a national historic marker by the Kansas State Historical Society in 1970, Herndon said. It did not become open full-time until a few years ago.

The museum is open to the public from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday and from 1 to 5 p.m. Sunday.

Bread Basket to gain from Hay-Aid fundraiser

By The Collegian Staff

The Haymaker Hall staff will be sponsoring its second annual "Hay-Aid" talent show fund raiser from noon to 10 p.m. today in the Union Little Theatre.

Proceeds from the event will be donated to the Flint Hills Bread Basket to help underprivileged Manhattan residents during the Christmas season.

Students will have the opportunity to show off their individual abilities and have fun while competing for cash prizes at the talent show, said Scott Kane, graduate student in student counseling and personal services, and director of Haymaker.

KQLA will be broadcast live from the 10-hour event, Kane said.

"We have also asked many of the local businesses in Manhattan to donate anything that they could to help the Hay-Aid fund raiser," he said.

"The primary benefit of the fund raiser is to raise money for the underprivileged people in our community that wouldn't have a special Thanksgiving or Christmas this year."

Kane said the idea originated solely as an activity for residence hall inhabitants. Later, it was decided to expand the event as a fund raiser for a community service project.

"Last year, the program included well over 200 participants, and we raised a little over $500 in proceeds. This year we plan on reaching an overall goal of $1,000 in proceeds from the affair," Kane said.

The staff will be charging a $1 donation fee for entry into the show to help the Bread Basket and Hay-Aid reach the goal.

"The program will be a success this year regardless of the amount of money that we will receive," said Kirk Rogg, senior in psychology and assistant hall director. "What we really need is participation from everyone in the residence halls to help make this program a guaranteed success."

Law enforcement key to stemming violence

Now that emotions surrounding last month's Aggieville disturbance have subsided, a number of solutions to prevent future violence have been suggested. Before these or any other plans can be discussed, however, it is necessary to realize two things.

First, it must be made clear that no plan will satisfy everyone. A controversial problem will certainly be met with a controversial solution.

Second, it is imperative a solution be adopted that will do one thing: end the violence. Such a solution must be decisive, and it's vital the University administration and students lend their full support in making it successful.

Student Senate has proposed a bill which would call for closing down Aggieville businesses on the day of the K-State-University of Kansas football game next year. While such a bill would certainly discourage students from crowding into Aggieville, it is unrealistic.

The revenue lost by businesses in the district would be significant, and business owners would be reluctant to approve a bill that unnecessarily penalizes them. Furthermore, the bill fails to address the problem head-on.

A truly workable and solvent plan contains four essential points:

— No-nonsense law enforcement should be stressed. Too many people were allowed to roam with open containers in Aggieville, and lax enforcement set the stage for blatant lawlessness later in the evening. If necessary, additional officers should be called in to assist, and cars should be prohibited in Aggieville after 8 p.m.

— Students should stress to each other and to visiting friends that Aggieville doesn't exist only to be destroyed every two years. Discard the "semi-annual riot" signs and "what a riot" T-shirts. Students must take responsibility.

— Glass containers should be banned in the area on the day of the game, and taverns should be prohibited from selling liquor in bottles. Such a move would not only reduce serious injuries, but would also decrease vandalism and lessen clean-up the next day.

— Finally, the game should be moved to later in the season, preferably mid-November. Students will still attend the game, and the likelihood of them gathering in the streets until 2 or 3 a.m. in cold weather will be significantly reduced.

When University officials, students and Aggieville merchants prepare to adopt a plan, they should consider these four points. Moreover, they should see that the problem is permanently solved.

The first two melees have provided the University and city more than enough negative publicity.

U.S. should support Aquino's government

The threat of war is heightening in the Philippines as Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile continues oppression of leftist leaders.

The sentiments of the Filipinos are running more and more against the defense minister's activities which are in direct conflict with the policies of President Corazon Aquino.

U.S. citizens are sending aid to Aquino for her to begin reconstructing the Philippine economy. However, Aquino may find it necessary to use those funds in a war against Enrile.

Financial support for rebuilding the Philippine economy is well-intentioned, and if Aquino could direct the funds to the proper resources without needing to use the money militarily, Americans should continue their support.

The situation in the Philippines may turn into civil war. The U.S. government is likely to support Enrile because of his anti-communist position. However, the Filipinos strongly support Aquino. If the United States supports democracy, it must support the wishes of the Filipinos, and that would be to keep Aquino in power.

UPC should evaluate campus needs, wants

For 30 years, Union Program Council has provided programs that entertain and enlighten the campus community. In addition, UPC has been a learning experience for the student volunteers who plan and promote the films, concerts, trips, exhibits and speakers that take place each academic year.

This year, however, UPC programs are not attracting the interest they've enjoyed in the past. The Special Events Committee lost $13,000 on the Starship concert Homecoming weekend. The committee's goal for the year is a profit of $9,000 — money which helps fund the events of other committees. Regaining financial footing will be a monumental task considering the lack of student support.

UPC Feature Films Committee is struggling as well, forced to contend with the popularity of cable TV and the convenience of video cassette recorders.

Any financial loss incurred by UPC is ultimately covered by the Union, which generates funds from patrons.

UPC cannot continue to lose money, and the time to examine why is now. UPC should fund serious, professional, thorough research to determine what students' needs and interests are. They may find the purpose of UPC needs to be altered. It would truly be a shame to see UPC dissolve, a victim of hindsight.

Goldwater to make living history

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., will retire at the end of this year, completing 34 years in the U.S. Senate. At 77, his age and declining health are obvious reasons for his retirement, but so is his disgust over the amount of money necessary for a re-election campaign.

Claiming that he didn't have the stomach for raising $3 million for the 1986 election, Goldwater said the amount of money spent on elections is an inexcusable crisis of liberty, and that re-election is not the first thing a member of Congress should think about. Explaining that senators believe the country isn't going to make it without them being re-elected, he recently said, "We've had over 1,500 senators in the history of the country, and it's hard for me to remember the names of any of 'em."

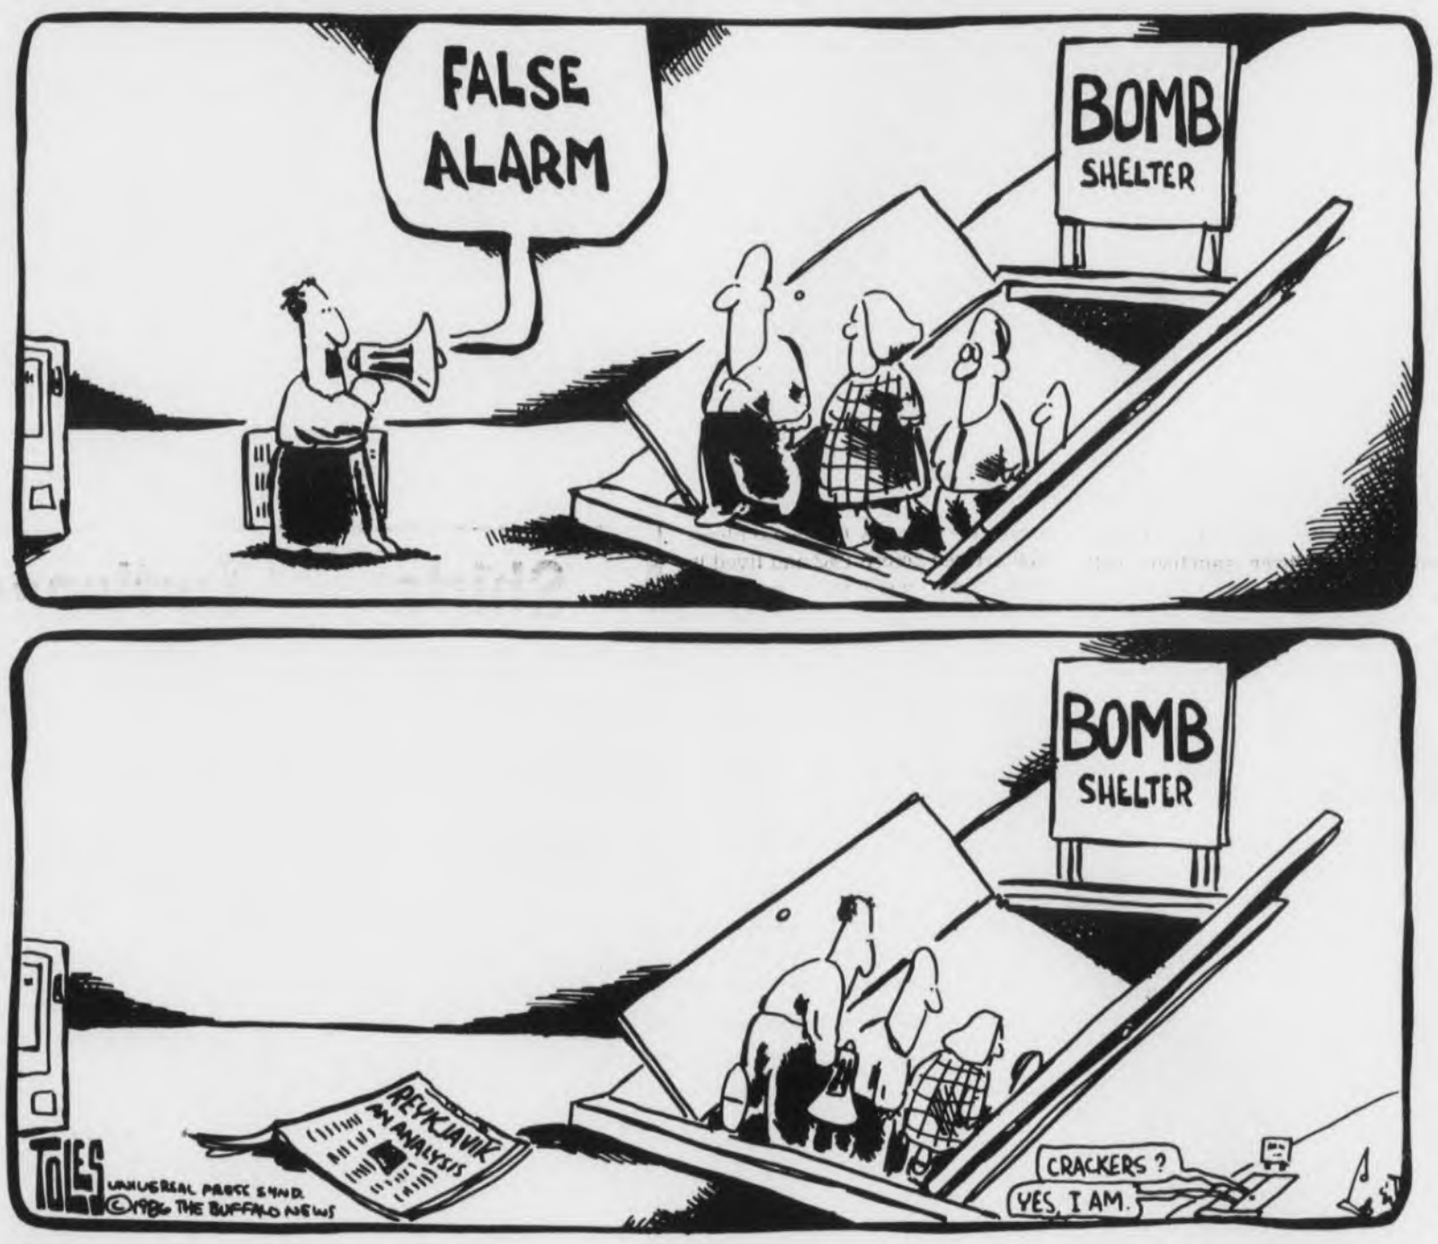
Barry Goldwater, however, is the exception to his own statement, and will be going out in a blaze to be remembered long after most senators are forgotten.

Goldwater is not, as he puts it, a "me-too Republican." His loyalty has always been to the libertarian ideal of minimal government intrusion on the freedom of individuals. During the Watergate scandal in 1974, he felt no disloyalty to his party when he told Richard Nixon that he had lost his support. With the same feeling now, Goldwater said of Nixon, "Anybody that would lie to his wife and lie to his children and then lie to his country, I have no use for."

His outspoken and candid promotion of his beliefs has given him a reputation more obvious than his political nickname of "Mr. Conservative." Says Rep. John McCain, R-Ariz., "When you hear Barry Goldwater make a statement, and God knows he's quotable, the sentiment on the hill is, 'Thank God Barry said what I didn't dare.'"

When Goldwater ran for president in 1964, his ideas were considered to be those of a right-wing Republican with ultraconservative ideas. In his campaign he declared, "Extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice, and...moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue." His opponent, Lyndon Johnson, capitalized on this attitude by labeling it "scary." However, in the past 22 years Goldwater has seen the United States move toward him, and his ideas are now part of the political dialogue and national policy. "Conservatism is sort of ruling the roost," he told Newsweek magazine in a recent interview. "It may not be as complete as I like it, but the point is that the country has been turned."

As much as he dislikes liberalism, Goldwater also fears new right-wing extremism. When New Right activist, the Rev. Jerry Falwell, blasted Sandra Day O'Conner in 1981, then a Supreme Court nominee, Goldwater declared, "I think that every good Christian ought to kick Falwell right in the ass!"



A long-time advocate of a strong national defense, Goldwater, as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, pushed through Congress the 1986 Defense Reorganization Act. Considering this his most important victory, Goldwater's bill streamlines the military decision-making process.

Some of the senator's recent concerns have made him appear to be on the liberal side of the Republican party. In a 1983 letter to President Reagan, Goldwater requested that the president make the United States live up to moral obligations owed to Amercan Indians. "I'm just fed up, sick and tired of the neglect of these people," he wrote, "while at the same time you are asking for millions, hundreds of millions, yes billions of dollars, to give to people scattered around this world to help in establishing human rights."

In 1984, he denounced the U.S.-directed mining of Nicaraguan harbors in violation of international law. Furthermore, on other military matters he has called for a budget freeze and remains in opposition to the MX missile.

His views on the Soviets is also noticeably different. Instead of wanting to "destroy the communists," he now believes we have a relationship in which there won't be any more major wars. He believes we need to make an effort to get along by asking each other, "What is there that we might be able to do to help you?"

In reviewing his ideas that cost him the 1964 presidential election, Goldwater appears to have lost the battle, but won the war. His place should be reserved in history during a period that America has undergone remarkable political change — for he had much to do with it.

Neanderthal ideology

Editor,

Re: George Sutton's guest column, "'Bleeding heart' opinions tiresome," in the Nov. 6 Collegian.

Thanks to the Collegian for the very good parody of Neanderthal right-wing ideology in George Sutton's column. His comments were laced with both subtle and not-so-subtle racism. He gave the impression that he really believed that unemployment is dropping, that yuppies are members of the working class and that the word "defense" in Strategic Defense Initiative is a magic spell to prevent offensive use of the system, rather than a brilliant public relations trick.

Sutton's rambling, incoherent style and heavy use of mindless cliches captures perfectly the Reagan-era primacy of buzz word over fact and red-baiting over debate. He almost had me believing that he is not a clever satirist, but a racist white boy who has had a relatively easy life and doesn't care about anyone else's suffering as long as his tuition gets paid.

Nicaraguan speech

Editor,

Wednesday, citizens of the region will have an unprecedented opportunity to hear first-hand from the leadership of the government of Nicaragua. Sergio Ramirez Mercado, the vice president of Nicaragua, will be in Lawrence, where he will address the public at 8 p.m. in Woodruff Auditorium in the University of Kansas Union.

His appearance in Kansas will be one of only three nationwide, as part of a tour arranged under the joint auspices of former presidents Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford. Our two most recent ex-presidents, a Democrat and a Republican, have become alarmed enough at recent developments in Washington, D.C., to sponsor a platform for a spokesman of a country the current administration falsely labels as our enemy. They are doing so to enable the American people to confront some essential truths that the administration's propaganda is trying to drown as it prepares the public to accept direct U.S. military intervention in Nicaragua before the end of President Reagan's term in office.

Ramirez, a former KU student, is a widely celebrated novelist, historian and educator. He is directly responsible for administering much of the country's basic infrastructure. He has also been one of the most important factors in frustrating our government's attempts to bend our allies into cooperating with our policies of lies and terror.

Recently, we have begun to learn of the administration's active plans to orchestrate a "mounting crisis" in which the United States will be "compelled" (along with its client governments in Central America) to break diplomatic relations with Nicaragua, to conduct "surgical strikes" against the helicopters Nicaragua uses to destroy Contra units on their terrorist missions, and to impose a naval blockade to prevent Nicaragua from resupplying its defenses. Now, more than ever, North Americans need to learn about the realities in Nicaragua that this propaganda and military campaign is designed to obliterate.

Students and faculty at K-State are organizing a carpool for those who want to hear Ramirez and to ask him questions. If you need a ride, come to 1800 Leavenworth St. at 5:30 p.m. Wednesday.

Aggie suggestions

Editor,

Re: The article, "Merchants seek solutions to ending violence," in Wednesday's Collegian.

I agree something needs to be done, but I don't agree with very many suggestions the committee has come up with.

One suggestion was to keep people from having alcoholic beverages on the street. This may be a good solution if there could be enough law enforcement personnel, but the crowds are too great in number for the amount of enforcement personnel.

Another suggestion was to post the city ordinances on signs stating it is illegal to have alcoholic beverages on the street. This might work in keeping the number of business signs from being broken because the people could throw the beer bottles, etc., at the ordinance signs instead.

The last suggestion I'll comment on is moving the game to the evening. I believe this will not help at all. In fact, a K-State-KU evening game in 1984 was the start of all the trouble in the first place. The people had all afternoon to party and drink, then the game was at 7 p.m. and then on to Aggieville at 9:30 p.m. after the game. That was the first year things really got out of hand.

My suggestions would be to board up the windows at the close of business on Saturday thus preventing broken windows, close Aggieville completely, or have each merchant contact Riley County Police Department about becoming a member of the reserve police force. Then each merchant could guard his own store and help enforce the city ordinance about drinking in the streets.

Representative talks about salary equity

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

What was once the cry "equal pay for equal work" has now become "equal pay for work of comparable value," said 55th district Rep. Joan Wagnon, D-Topeka.

Wagnon spoke to nearly 40 people on pay equity Monday night. Her audience consisted of all women except for one man.

"Like many issues, it (pay equity) is in a dormant stage," Wagnon said. "It's been 23 years since the Civil Rights Act and women are still paid less than men," she said.

Women's earnings are generally 55 to 65 percent of those of men, Wagnon said.

The term secretary at one time was an exulted title. Men in high positions were named secretaries — secretary of state, secretary of defense, secretary of interior. Then, masses of women learned to type, assumed the title of secretary and the term secretary became a less exulted position, Wagnon said.

Wagnon used two more examples to support her theory. Education and journalism, fields once dominated by men but now populated mainly with women, are areas where the prestige of the field has declined.

Supply and demand is an inadequate explanation for wage differences, Wagnon said. The Topeka Job Service has a high need for secretaries — positions where pay is consistently low — while the market is flooded with male-dominated jobs which maintain high salaries, she said.

Wagnon said the amount of education does not contribute to the wage gap. Using a Rand Study, she demonstrated that although women with a college education between the ages of 20 and 24 receive 86 percent of wages earned by their male counterparts for jobs which entail similar qualifications, wages steadily decrease for educated women in the age bracket 45 to 54 where women receive 56 percent. Between the ages of 55 to 64, women increase slightly to 59 percent of wages earned by men in similar jobs.

Sexism is not the only issue involved with pay equity, Wagnon said. Racism plays a role, too. Hispanic women consistently receive less wages for similar work, even lower than the average for all women, she said.

Wagnon introduced a pay equity bill to the Kansas Legislature. It was considered, but recently put aside.

The key is for legislators to keep pushing quietly for the bill and for constituents to voice their support to their legislators and Governor-elect Mike Hayden, who should be "especially receptive" to the bill, Wagnon said.

Department raises endowment funding

By LISA CARLIN
Collegian Reporter

Alumni from the Department of Chemistry have pledged $20,000 to help start the Future Chemists Scholarship Campaign.

The department was assisted by the KSU Foundation in the campaign, which is seeking to create a $100,000 permanent endowment to provide support for deserving undergraduate and graduate students in chemistry. The campaign drive sought three-year pledge commitments from alumni and is currently seeking corporate support.

The initiative for the scholarship campaign came from the Chemistry Alumni Advisory Council, said Kenneth Klabunde, chemistry department head.

The council is composed of K-State chemistry graduates from all over the United States, Klabunde said. He said this group, in discussion with department faculty, decided that more undergraduate scholarships were needed if the University was to continue to attract undergraduate students who wish to major in chemistry.

The scholarship drive began with a mail campaign followed by a two-day telefund Oct. 10-11, said Gordon Dowell, assistant director of communications for the KSU Foundation.

Alumni across the nation were contacted by volunteers from the Chemistry Advisory Council and faculty and graduate students from the department, Dowell said.

Klabunde said most of the scholarship money would be used for undergraduate scholarships of between $500-$1,200 a year. He said some of the money would fund scholarships for incoming freshmen. The remainder will provide additional scholarships for sophomores, juniors and seniors.

Klabunde said he hoped the first scholarships would be awarded for fall 1988. By that time, interest will have accumulated from money received in 1986 and 1987, making some scholarships available.

The KSU Foundation will be seeking corporate support for the program, Dowell said.

First, companies that hire K-State chemistry graduates in upper-level positions will be approached, he said. Also companies who recruit chemistry graduates from K-State will be approached, he said.

Klabunde said some of these companies include Dow Chemical, Phillips Petroleum Company and Amoco Chemical Company. He said the department is also trying to work more closely with companies in the state to make contacts and encourage them to hire K-State chemistry graduates.

Klabunde said he hoped the new scholarships would encourage students to come to K-State to major in chemistry, and that he would like the number of majors in the department to increase from the current number of 40 to 100.

Committee urges halt of public TV expansion

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Because of the state's troubled financial picture, the 1987 Legislature should not spend money to expand broadcast areas of public television stations, according to a report that a legislative study committee approved Monday.

The recommendation by the Special Committee on Communications, Computers and Technology represents a defeat for public stations that have planned to expand their viewing areas next year with the help of remote translator and repeater stations.

The Kansas Public Broadcasting Commission last week endorsed a $1.2 million plan to extend the signal of Bunker Hill station KOOD-TV to southwest Kansas via an unused channel assigned to the Garden City area. Station officials say that $400,000 of the project's cost must come from the state.

In addition, KOOD is promoting a $1.5 million plan to establish five small translator stations in northwest Kansas and KTWU-TV in Topeka wants to build a translator station in Parsons to carry its broadcast further south from an existing rebroadcast station at Iola-Moran. The Parsons station could cost between $350,000 and $750,000, officials said.

Latinos fear racism, firings due to new immigration law

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Hispanic groups fear that the new immigration law could lead to widespread firings of workers with Spanish accents, but a random survey finds little evidence that large numbers of Hispanics are losing their jobs.

"There are definitely rumblings in (Hispanic) neighborhoods" about job losses, said Amin David, president of a Hispanic rights group, Los Amigos of Orange County, Calif. "There's no question that employers are very edgy and concerned."

But while reports of firings haven't gone beyond the rumor stage, David predicted employer sanctions will harm the Latino community "because skin color will determine the employability of an individual — regardless of the documents that person can provide.

"It will unfortunately be a knee-jerk reaction, and we're very worried about that," he said.

Even before President Reagan signed the bill to overhaul the immigration laws — and make it a crime to hire an illegal alien — there were some indications in Houston and Dallas that employers might move to fire Latino workers who may fall into that category.

Trying to assess the extent of problem, The Associated Press surveyed selected cities. It found that while confusion reigns, job losses have been held in check as Hispanic organizations worked hard to explain the bill's employer sanctions provisions.

The immigration bill has two cornerstones: amnesty for illegal aliens who arrived before 1982 and lived in this country continously since then and penalties against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens.

For the next six months, the Immigration and Naturalization Service is to conduct a public information campaign on the sanctions program, during which no enforcement actions can be taken.

Dev Nelson, former K-State sports information director and play-by-play radio announcer, laughs as he recalls a 59-21 win in football over Oklahoma. Since 1981, Nelson has worked at KKSU on various projects.

Ex-Wildcat announcer recalls game-day tales

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

Here's a classic example of "Nelsonspeak" — the way former K-State radio announcer Dev Nelson would describe a game that was decided in the closing moments:

"I think we have another rip-snortin'...double-barrel, deep-dish dilly."

Nelson, who was the play-by-play man for Wildcat basketball 29 years and football for 15 years, has seen both the good and bad side of K-State athletics. He has numerous game-day memories that he can recall as if they happened yesterday.

When the University sold the broadcast rights to 'Cat athletic events to the K-State Radio Network in 1981, Nelson stepped down from the announcer's booth. Now, he concentrates solely on his job with Kansas Extension radio station KKSU where he has been since 1974.

During the week, Nelson works on radio programs such as "Kansas of Field," "Sports Journal" and "Voices of Kansas" which are broadcast on KKSU and on a statewide network. He also airs two daily sportscasts from KKSU's studio in the basement of McCain Auditorium.

But on weekends, Nelson trades in his microphone for the creature comforts of a sports memorabilia store in Manhattan. He offers a wide variety of items — from collector K-State programs to baseball cards.

"It gives me something to do on Saturday because it is hard for me to sit in the stands as a spectator," Nelson said.

Nelson, 60, considered himself a "sports junkie" during his childhood days at Marquette, a small town in McPherson County.

He went on to serve in World War II and later graduated from K-State in 1949 with a degree in radio-speech and a minor in journalism.

Nelson said he was fascinated with sports and always wanted to have a career that was associated with athletics. His career began as a spotter with the K-State Radio Network while he was in college.

"I used to walk around town with my wire recorder and pretend like I was doing play-by-play for K-State games," he said.

After Nelson graduated from the University, he accepted a job with a radio station in Pittsburg.

"It was an invaluable experience," Nelson said. "They were heavy on sports. We were doing something every night."

Nelson spent two years in Pittsburg and later held jobs in Salina and Lincoln. He had a two-year stint with the K-State Radio Network and then became sports director at WIBW in Topeka.

"I did just about everything in the 10 years I was at WIBW. I did radio, TV and was a sports anchor. It was work, but I was kind of in heaven because I was doing what I had always wanted to do," Nelson said.

Nelson returned to K-State in 1966 as sports information director. He began duties as a football play-by-play announcer — he had been doing basketball play-by-play since the early 50s — when he became sports information director.

"The '69 and '70 seasons were a delight in football because I saw what winning could do for a school," Nelson said.

"The 59-21 win against Oklahoma was simply unbelieveable. ABC thought the game was a hoax when I called to send them clips. It was my easiest week as sports information director because I was answering phone calls from across the country," he added.

He stepped down as sports information director in 1974 and began working with the Kansas Extension and KKSU. He remained as play-by-play man until 1981.

While K-State football did not give Nelson mass quantities of winning memories, K-State basketball gave him moments that he cherishes dearly.

"One of the greatest thrills was when we beat the Russian National Team in 1978. It was only an exhibition game, but the crowd went bonkers. I can remember Coach Hartman flying off the bench like a little boy," Nelson said.

"When we defeated KU in Lawrence in 1964 to win the Big Eight Conference was another exciting moment," he said. "Wilt Chamberlin was a sophomore that year."

Nelson has had to swallow some tough losses while broadcasting Wildcat basketball.

"When we lost to Marquette in the finals of the Midwest Regional in 1977, it had to be one of the toughest losses. Losing to Syracuse in the finals of the East Regional in 1975 was very tough also."

Although Nelson is an avid K-State fan, he wanted to make it big in broadcasting with his first love — professional baseball.

Nelson gained experience with minor-league games in Pittsburg and Topeka, and came close to making the Major Leagues in the early 1960s when he was chosen as one of two finalists for the color commentator's job with the Kansas City Athletics.

"It was down to me and a guy from California and Charlie Finley liked the guy from California. They had told me they thought I had the job and I got my hopes up. This was a big disappointment," Nelson said.

"I wanted a major league baseball job in the worst way."

Nelson said he admires professional baseball announcer Vin Scully who "...is simply a genius. He is out of sight."

Nelson said he tried to inject more into his broadcasts than what was going on on the field or court.

"I liked to have fun during the games. There is so much more to college life than athletics anyway," Nelson said.

Nelson has two children who graduated from K-State and are living in the Kansas City area.

Missouri prep standout plans to sign with KU

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Mike Masucci, a 7-foot center at Grandview High School, announced Monday he will accept a basketball scholarship at the University of Kansas.

Masucci's high school coach Kevin Albers, who made the announcement, said the big center planned to sign a national letter-of-intent Tuesday at the high school. The early signing period for high school seniors ends Wednesday.

Masucci, who averaged 19 points as a junior, had narrowed his list of choices to Kansas, Missouri and St. John's before visiting the KU campus in Lawrence.

K-State was among Masucci's final five choices, but basketball coaches had stopped recruiting the Missouri standout.

Albers said Masucci would cancel a visit he had been scheduled to make later this month to St. John's.

'Cat rugby team downs Kansas, 15-9

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

LAWRENCE — K-State's rugby club defeated the University of Kansas 15-9 Saturday to win the Heart of America League title and earn a trip to the Western region rugby championsip tournament.

"Those guys were intense, they were tough, and they prepared all year for us. It wasn't our best effort, but we just had the personnel and the talent to win," Greg Barnes said on the defeat of the intrastate rival.

"It's hard to explain how much (the win) meant to everybody," said Bill Knopic, senior kicker and inside center.

"We had three or four rookies that came through and learned a lot during the season. That's really the reason we won, because of the inexperienced players that we needed to come through for us, came through and played tough," he added.

Early in the first half, KU took a loose ball deep in K-State's territory for a try and converted on the extra-point for a 6-0 lead.

But the 'Cats retaliated with an offensive play that has worked like a charm for them all season. Barnes faked two handoffs and finally pitched the ball to sophomore wing Todd Shutts for a breakaway 45-meter try. Knopick converted on the extra kick and knotted the score at 6-6.

Late in the first half, KU kicker Paul King boomed a 44-meter penalty kick and the half ended with KU ahead, 9-6.

To open the second half, K-State's kicking game lifted the Wildcats to a 9-9 tie as Knopick booted a 23-meter penalty kick.

Midway through the second half, junior fullback Dave Todd bolted for a 23-meter try. Knopick connected on the kick to put the 'Cats up for good, 15-9.

Hamilton plans on using 'barn' in recruiting

OKLAHOMA STATE

Last Season's Record:
15-13/6-8 (6th in conference)
Collegian's Projected Finish: 6th
Projected All-Big Eight Performer:
Todd Christian (Honorable Mention)

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Leonard Hamilton knows that Oklahoma State basketball has never had many bright days and he knows the program he has taken over has handicaps which do not plague other Big Eight Conference members.

The biggest handicap is the Cowboys' Gallagher Hall. In a conference which is seeing its basketball reputation blossom and is seeing the construction of some fine basketball arenas, the Cowboys still play in a 6,700-seat building which many call a "barn."

But Hamilton, 38, faced the media at the annual Big Eight Preseason Press Day smiling and saying he will use the crowd intensity and reverberating noise of Gallagher as a recruiting advantage.

This from a man who comes to OSU after being an assistant at Kentucky for 14 years under Joe B. Hall and Eddie Sutton, and watching the Wildcats play in the boisterous, 23,000-seat Rupp Arena.

Hamilton became renowned for his recruiting prowess at Kentucky and he plans on using his skills to convince big-city ball players that Stillwater and a soon-to-be-refurbished Gallagher aren't so bad.

In his first recruiting year, Hamilton shipped in nine new recruits to add to the six returning players from former coach Paul Hansen's team.

The brightest sign of hope from those new faces comes from a man who hails from Newton. Todd Christian played two years at Hutchinson Junior College and now brings his feathery shooting touch to Gallagher to help Hamilton's chances of success.

"(Christian) understands the game, he's an outstanding shooter and he brings a new dimension to our game," Hamilton said.

The old dimension Hamilton spoke of was one which aided in Hansen's firing from his job. It was a maligned form of offense which by the end of the year consisted of throwing the ball to 7-foot-4 center Alan Bannister and hoping for the best.

The Cowboys might be highly reliant upon Christian's abilities to shoot the ball from any wall in Gallagher, because Bannister has been slowed by an ankle injury which has sapped the remaining strength from his previously weak legs.

After trying to practice, the lack of muscle in Bannister's legs led to knee problems which left the English native working on his own so he may return to practice. Hamilton is listening to the doctors and praying for the best.

The return of Bannister certainly would clear up the foggy picture which Hamilton is looking at. He quickly recognized the undeveloped potential of the lanky Bannister.

"I have never been around a kid that big with that kind of shooting touch," Hamilton said.

Hamilton's biggest problem is finding a way to blend the interesting mixture of players he has assembled. He said his players realize that challenge and have met it face-to-face.

"We're a young and inexperienced ball club...we've worked very hard," Hamilton said. "Anytime you have a team doing that at this early point, you have to be pleased."

In an exhibition game Saturday, it was a mixture of old and new which started for the Cowboys. At guards were 6-1 Nolan Richardson, who last season lost his academic eligibilty 13 games into the season, fellow returnee 5-10 Rashon Patton and the 6-6 Christian. Inside for OSU were a pair of newcomers from Seminole (Okla.) Junior College, 6-7 Robert Smith and 6-10 Sylvester Kincheon.

Hamilton said he isn't concerned so much with whom he starts, he just wants to have an effective team.

"Anytime you have a new system, a new philosophy, and the kids (on the court) are not playing disciplined in it, I just have to put five kids on the floor and keep running them in and out," Hamilton said.

Part of Hamilton's plan in making OSU attractive to top-notch recruits is making his schedule top-notch.

Hamilton didn't fool around. He has compiled one of the toughest road schedules in the Big Eight consisting of 17 games away from Gallagher.

Nee must provide wins for Cornhusker fans

NEBRASKA

Last Season's Record:
19-11/8-6 (tie 3rd in conference)
Collegian's Projected Finish: 7th
Projected All-Big Eight Performer:
Brian Carr (Honorable Mention)

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It seems only fitting that Nebraska rookie head coach Danny Nee wore a red suit to the annual Big Eight Preseason Basketball Press Day.

Nee, in only eight months on the job and yet to coach a regular-season game in the Bob Devaney Sports Center, is already inundated by "Big Red Fever" that runs rampant across the state of Nebraska in adulation of the beloved Cornhuskers.

"There are great sports fans in the state of Nebraska," Nee said. "They love their sports — college sports. Lincoln is a sports town."

While Lincoln is a basking collegiate sports town, the scales tip heavily around the city and state in favor of the perennial nationally ranked football team. The university has become spoiled with the letter "W" — as in win.

Those high expectations caused the ouster of former coach Moe Iba who led the 'Huskers to three straight National Invitational Tournament berths and the school's first-ever National Collegiate Athletic Association bid last year.

Iba was fired following a 67-59 loss to Western Kentucky in the first round of the Southeast Regionals.

Nee, 40, one of four new head coaches in the Big Eight, is charged with elevating the Cornhuskers' basketball fortunes even higher. The Brooklyn native is familiar with the process of preserving a national powerhouse program, and the task of reforming a downtrodden institution into the national spotlight.

Nee was an assistant to Richard "Digger" Phelps for four seasons at Notre Dame when the Fighting Irish went 91-27 and went to the NCAA Tournament four times — including a Final Four appearance in 1978.

In 1980, Nee left South Bend to take over the moribund program at Mid-American Conference member Ohio University. After two rebuilding years, his 1982-83 Bobcat team went 23-9 and started a run of four straight 20-win seasons in Athens.

Wins, especially the numbers Nebraska fans demand, will be harder to come by for Nee in the Big Eight.

"It's a similar situation," Nee said comparing his new job to his former. "In the rebuilding structure, you have to do certain things. You have to have short-term goals and long-term goals. I try to make most of my decisions based on long-term goals; on where our program is going to be in three to five years.

"We want to put a team on the floor that, every night we go out, we feel we have a chance to win," he said. "We want to build a tradition that Nebraska teams play hard and they play unselfishly. We want to get back to a post-season tournament, and we want to win 20 games."

Nebraska's hopes of reaching the 20-win plateau will rest primarily on the shoulders of five returning players: 6-foot-1 guard Brian Carr, 6-5 forward Bernard Day, 6-9 forward Bill Jackman, 6-6 forward Mike Martz and 6-3 guard Anthony Bailous. Carr has started every game for the 'Huskers the last two seasons. And Day, who came to Nebraska from Moberly (Mo.) Junior College last year after playing for new K-State assistant coach Dana Altman, was an All-Big Eight Tournament pick last season as a junior.

These players, as well as incoming recruits, are trying to learn Nee's up-tempo offense after playing a controlled, selective, half-court offense in previous seasons under Iba.

"As a new coach in the Big Eight establishing a program, the players have to learn a new system," Nee said. "I don't think you will see any of the new coaches come in and show their style of play right away. It takes at least three years to completely install your type of play."

Nee, like the other new coaches in the conference, will need to become acquainted with the Big Eight's surroundings.

But Nee said he is becoming accustomed to the Cornhusker state through his duties as basketball coach.

"I have been to Carson, Chadron, Broken Elbow. I'm even going to find out where (General George) Custer was; it might be in Lincoln if we don't find some players."

South African police utilize dogs to disperse striking GM workers

By The Associated Press

PORT ELIZABETH, South Africa — Police used dogs and rubber whips to disperse strikers outside the General Motors plant Monday, and the company said those who stay off the job will be fired.

The automaker gave strikers a deadline of 9 a.m. Tuesday to return to work. The walkout began Oct. 29 in this depressed industrial city on the Indian Ocean, where GM is the largest employer.

Sixteen workers were arrested during the clash with police at the plant gate and released on bail of 100 rand ($45) each without formal charges, their union said.

Police said about 300 strikers were intimidating workers who wanted to go to their jobs inside the plant.

Employees struck over demands for compensation from the American parent company after General Motors announced plans to sell its South African operation to local management.

Although the strike began as a wildcat action, the National Automobile and Allied Workers Union has endorsed the workers' demands. GM says it will not discuss the issues until the strike ends.

Bob White, the GM managing director, said about one-third of the 2,000 strikers returned to work Monday and the company also would consider rehiring most of the 567 fired for holding a plant sit-in two weeks ago. He is an American who will leave when the sale takes effect Jan. 1.

He said limited production had resumed, but the plant was running at far below its normal output of 150 cars a day.

A prolonged confrontation would be a severe blow in Port Elizabeth. It is the nation's most depressed city and Ford has moved its vehicle production to Pretoria.

Most of the strikers are of mixed race or black.

Unrest in the black townships and periodic black boycotts of white stores have increased the damage to the economy.

White said 40 to 60 workers who had committed or encouraged violence during the strike would not be rehired.

"If the union is going to hold out on that, it's going to be a long day," he told reporters. "That says they condone violence."

Union leader Freddie Sauls said there were no plans for talks and "there's actually no communication." He said no membership meeting was planned until the company's Tuesday deadline.

Sauls took a grim view of the police action earlier Monday. "I'm convinced we could hold out against GM," he said, "but we can't hold out against the security forces."

A police spokesman said about 1,000 people were outside the plant when officers arrived and ordered them to disperse. He said many moved away, but about 300 stayed, chanting slogans and interfering with workers trying to enter the plant.

"We then had no alternative but to disperse them, using police dogs and sjamboks (rubber whips)," he said. "Two policemen were stoned and suffered slight head injuries."

President of Renault shot in Paris; officials suspect terrorists in attack

By The Associated Press

PARIS — The president of the state-run Renault automobile company was shot to death Monday night near his Paris home and police said left-wing terrorists "very probably" were the killers.

Georges Besse, 58, was hit several times in the head and chest in the attack at 8:25 p.m. on Boulevard Edgar Quinet, almost in front of his home, police at the scene reported.

They said they suspected he was slain by members of the Direct Action terrorist group, which has carried out dozens of assassinations and bombings in France in recent years.

It was reported that Besse's chauffeur had dropped him off about 50 yards from his home after driving him there from Renault headquarters in suburban Boulogne-Billancourt.

The Agence France Presse news agency said Besse was shot by a man and a woman passing by in a car.

No individual or organization claimed responsibility for Besse's death.

Terrorist groups with links to the Middle East claimed responsibility for five bombings in September in Paris and its suburbs that killed 11 people and wounded more than 150. That group demanded the release of three Middle Easterners held in French jails.

"One can't understand why this blind violence is turning against economic leaders who have never been involved in politics," said Yvon Gattaz, president of the French Employers Association.

Besse was named head of Renault, France's largest automaker, by the Socialist government of then-Premier Laurent Fabius in January 1985.

Besse, married and the father of five children, was the fifth president of Renault since the firm was nationalized at the end of World War II.

Earlier, he achieved prominence as the founder of France's nuclear industry.

In 1956, he was appointed assistant industrial director of the French Atomic Energy Commission and two years later became director general of of the USSI atomic energy construction firm.

One of his first actions at Renault, which has an overall debt estimated at $10 billion, was to cut 21,000 jobs from the work force of 160,000 that provoked labor disputes.

As an industrial trouble-shooter he was widely compared to Chrysler's Lee Iacocca.

rent fiscal year," Graves said. "They represent fees already paid by students, not additional funding from the state. They will help offset the expected reductions in university budgets under the state allotment procedure."

The Regents have proposed a release of $1.5 million of the money collected in additional fees resulting from enrollment increases at the University of Kansas, K-State and Pittsburg State. ASK said it will lobby not only in support of that request but also to make the release of fees "a permanent legislative policy."

ASK also wants the enrollment adjustment in the funding formula for the six universities changed so that the schools would immediately receive increased state aid when their enrollments go up and keep for a while the funds they lose when enrollments go down — until their funding from the state reached the level of their peer institutions.

That proposal also has been endorsed by the Regents.

The work-study program currently operates with state appropriations matched by private employers to pay student salaries in career-related part-time jobs.

Kansas had many scoring opportunities late in the game, but the K-State defense held tough and clung to the 6-point margin of victory.

"We made a lot of dumb mistakes that could have cost us the game, but we wanted it more than they did, even though they wanted it real bad," Todd said. "We beat them from sheer intensity, and we beat them because we're the best. It was a team effort, and that's all there is to it."

K-State is ranked No. 7 nationally and will play at the Western regional championships in April at a site to be determined later. The 'Cats finished second in the tournament last year when they lost to Air Force in the championship game.

best work."

Downey is the only woman in her class.

"All the guys are like brothers to me. They take care of me. We goof around together and they give me a hard time, too. We're all good buddies," she said.

Riden and Downey agree that they get to know the people in their classes really well — especially after pulling all-nighters with them.

"It gets a little bit rowdy at night; it's a more relaxed atmosphere," Riden said. "During the day when you're in studio for four hours, you get restless and you take more breaks. When you come in on your own time, you give a little more."

Riden does not look at all-nighters in terms of being up all night. "It's the fact that you have, for example, only 12 hours left (to finish a project). It becomes a race against time," she said.

"I don't think people really get tense until there are about three hours left before it's due. People begin screaming, yelling, and turning their music up really loud," Riden said. "That's when people start to freak out. There comes a point when you know you won't get it all done."

Although most students work at the studios in Seaton Hall or Seaton Court, some student choose to work at home.

However, most students benefit from working together, Hess said.

"When students cluster, they exchange some good ideas."

Instructors do not purposely design all-nighters. They are the result of a student's preference, Hess said.

fourths of the students came from intact families. They also reported that the climate in their families was good," she said.

Respondents listed their opinions on abstinence, permissiveness with affection, permissiveness without affection, cohabitation and the double standard. The double standard says men may have premarital sex but women may not.

Of these, about 15 percent said they approved of cohabitation. None of the women believed in the double standard, but one-third thought their fathers did.

Bergen said the study fostered discussion among about 50 people attending the SSSS meeting. The SSSS members are sex educators and therapists.

Planning

Omaha allows tracks in industrial districts, while Lincoln allows them as a conditional use in industrial or "P," publicly owned districts. An example of this is the state fairgrounds in Lincoln, where the city's track is located.

Although a variety of zones in the cities allowed tracks, all required review necessary for conditional use designation.

Riley County Planner Monty Wedel said dog tracks would work in a variety of zones, but would work best "as a conditional use." This would require review by the planning board, followed by consideration of the Manhattan Board of Zoning Appeals.

Board chairman Ray Weisenburger said he would prefer elected persons, such as the Riley County or Manhattan city commissions to make the final decision on such issues.

Wedel said one possibility would be to allow tracks in commercial districts with a special use permit.

One problem with just listing tracks as a use in commercial districts is that if an area is zoned as that, any use listed in commercial districts would be permissible. Other possibilities would include recreational areas, amusement parks, riding trails, boarding stable for commercial uses and motorized vehicle racetracks.

Although there was no vote on the issue, the general consensus was that track placement and construction would be better regulated by a Planned Unit Overlay District, which would be allowed in any zoning district.

Wedel said a site review plan should also be included.

WHEN IS THE RIGHT TIME TO CALL YOUR GRANDPARENTS?

a) Five minutes into "The Lawrence Welk Show."
b) About a week before your birthday.
c) When you just want to tell them you miss them, and that you ate the last of Grandma's chocolate-chip cookies this morning.

There's nothing grandparents like better than a call from a grandchild in college. But if you do accidentally happen to interrupt Lawrence, you ought to have something worth telling them.
For example, you could mention that you called using AT&T Long Distance Service because you can depend on AT&T's high quality service and exceptional value.
And then you can tell them that AT&T gives you immediate credit if you dial a wrong number.
And that you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections.
Finally, of course, you should quickly reassure them that you're eating enough, then let them hurry back to the TV to catch the rest of the Lennon Sisters' Blue Oyster Cult Medley.

Travis, task force to field questions

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Students will have a chance to question Athletic Director Larry Travis and Athletic Fee Task Force members about the proposed athletic fee Thursday in the Union Courtyard.

As part of Student Governing Association-sponsored SGA Week, a panel will answer questions from noon to 1 p.m. to give students a better understanding of the proposed fee, Task Force Chairman Doug Folk told members Tuesday night.

At the meeting, task force members discussed incorporating an athletic fee, if assessed, with the present student activity fee.

"In that way, the Senate would be more likely to review it," Folk said. "The finance committee just loves to look at budgets."

"If the student body recommends it, I guess that would be a good way to handle it," said Bill Majerus, task force member and graduate student in agronomy.

"I think it would be a better control on the students' money by going through allocation," Majerus said. "Directly or indirectly, the students would have more say on how it goes."

Folk said he will need to talk to Senate about it.

"The standing committee I'm on — student affairs and social services — is just starting to look into raising the activity fee," he said. "This may correlate, but I don't think they're on the same timetable.

"The committee wants to look at the merits of each group, and then look at raising the whole fee."

Folk said he has no idea how much the committee may raise the fee. "We just started," he said.

Kirk Caraway, senior in political science and philosophy, said that if the athletic fee is incorporated into the activity fee, the athletic department could come to Senate and ask for an increase through the regular allocation process "without having to go through any kind of referendum or anything."

Caraway suggested having the athletic fee reviewed annually by Senate if it becomes part of the activity fee.

To gauge student opinion about the assessment of an athletic fee, Jennifer Leeds, task force member and sophomore in political science and economics, told the group about a survey she will conduct.

Leeds said Ron Downey, professor of planning and evaluation services, is helping her prepare the survey.

"What he suggested was to have a survey where you ask (students) what they think about the fee concept in general," she said. Then, she said, she will list several specific fees and ask students to rank them in order of importance.

"He said our sample would have to be a maximum of 100," Leeds said. "He said that would be more than adequate."

Leeds said she will also ask those interviewed whether they are supported financially by their parents, because that could be a factor in determining whether a student could "afford" an athletic fee.

The survey probably will be conducted early next semester, she said.

When questioned, Downey said he believed a survey of 100 students was adequate. He said he suggested using the student directory and selecting one of every 200 names.

"For the amount of time they have, they'll get a fairly random sample," Downey said.

It is also a "fairly cheap" method, he said.

Majerus said he is concerned with the amount of information students will have about the athletic fee.

"I'm not convinced that we've spent adequate time with the (athletic department) budgets," he said.

Going over the budgets at three task force meetings was not enough, Majerus said. "We've looked at the 1985-86 athletic budget and the proposed 1986-87 athletic budget, and that's all we've looked at," he said.

Majerus said he was interested in learning "how the athletic department got to be $400,000 in the hole."

"We need more background information," he said. "If we put out a fact sheet, the students will want to know where we got our information."

Staff/Robert Squires

Jennifer Leeds, sophomore in political science and economics, explains Tuesday evening at the Athletic Fee Task Force meeting a survey she will conduct as Kelly Lamborn, senior in journalism and mass communications, listens. The survey will determine what students think about fees.

President seeks large budget cut

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan's proposed budget for the next fiscal year may seek up to a record $54 billion in spending cuts and other savings, a 6 percent increase in defense spending and no new taxes, administration officials said Tuesday.

Those figures, confirmed in part by budget director James C. Miller III and in part by other administration officals, would be included in a budget document designed to pare the federal deficit to $108 billion in the fiscal year that begins next Oct. 1.

Miller said "judicious trimming of bloated programs," along with new user fees, sales of federal assets and loan portfolios and some program eliminations would be proposed to meet the $108 billion level, which is the fiscal 1988 target of the Gramm-Rudman budget-balancing law.

In a speech to the National Electrical Association, Miller said the White House still intends to meet the target, despite recent talk by Democratic congressional leaders of easing it.

One administration source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the Office of Management and Budget headed by Miller is considering resubmitting many of the same proposals it proposed unsuccessfully this year, but with some major modifications and exceptions.

For instance, the administration has abandoned its proposals to elimiminate the Small Business Administration and Amtrak subsidies, although will likely recommend large cuts in both programs, the source said.

But so far, the administration isn't making much headway toward coming up with the size of budget savings that will be needed, Miller indicated.

Speaking with reporters after his speech, Miller confirmed that all but two federal agencies — the Education and Energy departments — had submitted preliminary spending requests exceeding White House targets.

He said this was not unusual so early in the budget process, a view echoed by White House spokesman Larry Speakes.

Hayden to reveal reduced budget plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State agencies learn Wednesday how much Gov.-elect Mike Hayden expects them to reduce their spending during the final 7½ months of this fiscal year in order to restore financial integrity to Kansas government.

Hayden declined to discuss amounts of the proposed cuts in a brief news conference Tuesday, but said he would reveal specific figures at a Wednesday afternoon news conference.

"It's fair to say significant action is going to be required — of significant magnitude in terms of the dollars involved" to bring state spending into line with the reduced amount of available revenue the rest of this fiscal year, the incoming governor told reporters.

The cuts will go beyond mere belt-tightening, Gov. John Carlin said following a half-hour meeting with Hayden Tuesday. The reductions in spending will undoubtedly dig into fiscal flesh, Carlin added.

"The fat has been trimmed for some time," the outgoing governor said. "We're down to having to sacrifice a little bit."

The incoming and outgoing chief executives met to discuss steps which must be taken immediately to address a projected shortfall in state tax revenues.

Those reduced revenues, pegged at $93.6 million for the entire fiscal year, would plunge the state into a $13 million deficit by the end of the fiscal year, next June 30, if nothing was done.

That won't happen, Hayden and Carlin both said, because steps will be taken quickly to avert a crisis.

Speaking to reporters at separate impromptu news conferences following the meeting, the two leaders said Hayden will announce Wednesday how much each state agency will be required to trim its spending between now and June 30, then Carlin will make it official on Thursday that he is implementing an allotment procedure.

The allotment prohibits agencies from spending any more money than they spent the previous fiscal year, and would save $13 million. However, Carlin said he thinks the money Hayden will trim from the budget — which he expects the Legislature to ratify in the 1987 session — will make the allotment moot, because those cuts will not only save the $13 million but many million more dollars.

Neither Hayden nor Carlin had a figure on how much the cuts would total, but Carlin indicated it could be anywhere from $30 million to $60 million.

Road complications focus of city meeting

By TOM SCHULTES
Business/Government Editor

Funding for relocation of railroad facilities associated with the Southern Arterial project and other traffic problems in the community dominated discussion at Tuesday night's meeting of the Manhattan City Commission.

Commissioners discussed funding alternatives for part of the relocation of Union Pacific Railroad facilities due to construction of the Southern Arterial.

City Manager Don Harmon said the alternatives were to cover the needed $1.4 million through the issuance of general obligation bonds or by attaching the costs to a special benefit district for parking lot construction at the Manhattan Town Center mall.

He said overall funding includes $3 million from the state and highway user funds allocated to the city. Harmon said the city has stated the intention of using $400,000 annually from these funds, but noted that could be changed by commissioners at any time.

The city's obligation to the arterial project is $5.4 million. The $1.4 million in excess of the project's original budget is for Phase I of construction. Bids for Phase II are expected to be let in February, with estimates of about $900,000.

Harmon emphasized the city receives the highway user funds regardless of the current allocation.

"(General obligation bonds are) definitely the best way to go," he said.

In other comments regarding road work related to downtown redevelopment, Mayor Rick Mann said he had received "a number of phone calls" regarding traffic routing near the Country Kitchen restaurant, 420 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Bruce McCallum, director of public works, said the intersection connecting the frontage road and Tuttle Creek Boulevard would not be reopened until two highway lanes are paved.

McCallum, who said the current situation may exist until March or April, urged commissioners not to attempt temporary solutions due to problems that may arise from improper action.

"Hope that we have good weather to get those lanes paved," McCallum said.

He also said traffic problems north on Tuttle Creek Boulevard

Investor plans to keep tire plants open

Congressmen express shutdown fears

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A financier behind an attempted takeover of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. assured members of Congress Tuesday he has no plans to shut down any tire plants, including one in Kansas, if he gains control of the company.

"We want to make it prosper by making that tire company the best," said Sir James Goldsmith, a British-French investor who has acquired 11 percent of Goodyear. "We've said we have no plans to close any factories."

Goldsmith made the statement to the House Judiciary subcommittee on monopolies during questioning by Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan., who asked about the future of a Goodyear tire plant in Topeka, which employs more than 2,000 workers.

However, Goldsmith acknowledged that he would sell Goodyear subsidiaries to pay debts he has accumulated in his takeover bid.

Goldsmith met with Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., for about 30 minutes after the hearing and delivered a similar assurance that no tire plants would be closed.

At the hearing, Glickman criticized the Reagan administration for failing to more closely scrutinize the deals of corporate raiders and the potential for takeovers to dampen competition.

The Wichita Democrat called for stronger antitrust enforcement in large business acquisitions and recommended that corporate buyers provide greater disclosure of the potential effects on communities and workers.

Glickman, a subcommittee member and former Securities and Exchange Commission attorney, expressed concerns at the outset of the hearing that the hostile takeover of Goodyear could threaten jobs in Kansas.

"I think my constituents in Topeka and people in communities around the country have a right to know how their lives will be affected by a hostile takeover," Glickman said in a statement.

The Goodyear plant is not located in Glickman's congressional district.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., submitted a written statement to the subcommittee urging the lawmakers

Police blame terrorists for shooting

PARIS — Police said Tuesday they believe two women from the terrorist group Direct Action were responsible for killing industrialist Georges Besse, who was gunned down on the street outside his home.

The president of the state-owned Renault automobile company was shot about 8 p.m. Monday a few steps from the front door of his apartment building near the Monteparnasse railway station.

Witnesses said one of women calmly walked up to Besse, 58, and fired the shots that killed him while the other acted as a lookout.

Police sources, quoted by the French news media, said questioning of witnesses gave this version of the slaying:

Besse came face to face with the two women as he was about to enter the apartment building.

One women, about 30, shot Besse first in the shoulder, and when he fell to the sidewalk she shot him twice more at pointblank range in the chest and head. She was "covered" by the other woman, but the accounts did not say if the second woman also was armed.

The second woman then asked the killer: "Is it really the right one?" and her companion replied, "Yes, it's sure."

Then the killer told a pedestrian, a woman who was walking by at the time of the shooting, "Beat it!" and the killer and her companion fled on foot.

Pamphlets found in a Paris subway station claimed responsibility in the name of Direct Action, a terrorist group of the extreme left that has carried out many other attacks.

Group endorses public TV funding

TOPEKA — A legislative study committee Tuesday endorsed a plan to establish a $1.2 million public television repeater station near Garden City and urged the Legislature make a proposed $400,000 state contribution for the project a top funding priority.

The action by the Special Committee on Communications, Computers and Technology reversed a decision the panel reached Monday, when it adopted recommendations that called for no state spending next year to extend public television broadcasts to unserved areas of Kansas.

But on a vote of 6-2, the committee approved inclusion of the new language in its report to the 1987 Legislature. The two committee members who voted against the proposal said the state's financial crisis would preclude virtually any new spending.

The committee report still recommends against state financial participation in two other proposals aimed at extending public television signals to extreme northeastern and southeastern sections of the state.

Letterman receives traffic fines

NEW CANAAN, Conn. — Talk show host David Letterman is in trouble with his local police again.

Letterman, fined $40 in May when caught using a radar detector in his car, was stopped last week for speeding. He also received a ticket for not having a valid Connecticut driver's license, police said.

Letterman was cited for driving 57 mph in a 40 mph zone in New Canaan at 11:34 p.m. Friday, police said Monday. After he was stopped, police discovered that Letterman lacked a Connecticut driver's license.

"He had a valid California license," said New Canaan Police Chief Ralph Scott. "But the law says once you establish residency in a state you must get a valid operator's license."

Letterman, a resident of this affluent suburban community, has until Dec. 5 to contest his latest ticket — worth $147 — or to plead guilty and mail in the fine.

Problems halt shuttle simulation

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Five astronauts boarded a space shuttle Tuesday for the first time since the Challenger disaster, but the mock countdown aboard Atlantis was halted 25 seconds short of the simulated engine firing by problems with computer software.

Several other troubles cropped up that might have halted a real launch, but NASA spokesman Jim Ball said officials considered the test successful because it accomplished its main goal: maintaining launch team sharpness during the long flightless period following the Challenger explosion.

It was primarily a test of the launch crews and not of the shuttle and it met all of its objectives, he said.

Robert Gibson, who commanded the astronaut crew aboard Atlantis, termed it a good test and said "it was a morale booster, even though it was a simulation, and a real morale booster for the launch team. The fact that we had problems made it more realistic."

Gibson said it was "difficult to look at the launch pad and the orbiter without flashbacks (to the Challenger accident). I don't think we'll ever get over it. But I decided a long time ago I'm going to fly again."

He volunteered his crew to take the first trip when flights resume. The crew that boarded Atlantis on Tuesday is the same one that flew the last successful shuttle flight, that of Columbia, which ended just 10 days before Challenger exploded Jan. 28, killing the seven crew members.

Doctors implant first insulin pump

BALTIMORE — Johns Hopkins Hospital doctors on Tuesday reported the country's first successful implantation of a computerized, radio-controlled insulin pump for diabetes.

The device, about the size of a hockey puck and encased in a titanium shell, was surgically placed eight days ago into the abdomen of F. Jackson Pietrow, a professor at American University in Washington.

Pietrow, a Bethesda resident who has had diabetes for 26 years, is one of an estimated 1 million insulin-dependent diabetics in the United States.

If the new pump system works as expected, Pietrow no longer will have to inject himself daily with the hormone which helps break down sugars and other carbohydrates.

"It's the first device designed for regular clinical use that is expected to last for more than five years," said its inventor, Robert E. Fischell, chief of technology transfer at Hopkins' Applied Physics Laboratory.

Bundy reprieve disappoints town

LAKE CITY, Fla. — Residents of this small North Florida town expressed frustration Tuesday after a court granted Theodore R. Bundy a reprieve less than seven hours before his scheduled execution for the murder of a 12-year-old Lake City girl.

"The (Bundy case) has become a farce in the eyes of the public," said City Councilman Mike Collins.

"I feel like he should be punished. If it was my child, I'd certainly want him punished," said Pearl Walker, clerk at the Holiday Inn where Bundy stayed the night before the slaying.

Kimberly Diane Leach was abducted Feb. 9, 1978, from Lake City Junior High School and was assaulted before her body was left in an abandoned hog shed.

Her mother, Freda Leach, refused comment on the stay granted Bundy by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta.

The stay was indefinite, to allow Bundy's attorneys to present briefs and oral arguments.

"It could be weeks or months," said Joyce Larkin, case manager at the court.

The Florida Attorney General's office asked the U.S. Supreme Court to dissolve the stay.

It was the second time in five months that the suspected serial killer, who turns 40 on Nov. 24, came within 24 hours of dying in the electric chair at Florida State Prison near Starke.

Energy secretary testifies at hearing

Soviet reactor 'likely' lacking upgrades

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union most likely has resumed operation of some nuclear plants without making the safety improvements promised in the wake of the Chernobyl accident, Energy Secretary John Herrington said Tuesday.

"Our best estimate is they started Chernobyl up probably too soon to do all the upgrades they said they were going to do," Herrington said after testifying at a Senate hearing. "We are reasonably sure they are operating reactors today without the upgrades they promised."

Herrington called the improvements "major installations" that couldn't have been completed before the Chernobyl facility started up Sept. 29 — five months after a fire and explosion ripped through one of its four reactors and sent a cloud of radiation across the globe.

Asked if the safety improvements eventually will be made, Herrington replied, "There's no way of knowing. I certainly hope so."

Herrington also said the United States is having trouble getting information about two reactors the Soviet Union is building near Cienfuegos, Cuba, 180 miles from Key West. He said the Soviets were reluctant to discuss the plants in August at a meeting in Vienna.

"The typical response was, you will be reading about this in our technical journals. And that is not good enough in this situation," Herrington said.

The first plant was started in 1983 and scheduled to go on line next year. Construction on the second began in 1985 with startup planned for 1990. However, Herrington said there have been delays, and operation of the first plant is "not imminent."

The secretary said he suspects the reactors will not be of the same design as the graphite-moderated plant that caught fire at Chernobyl. But he said the United States has no details about the construction of the Cuban plants, their safety systems and who will be operating them.

The energy secretary said uncertainties about the reactors include:

—Containment building. The first reactor under construction does have one, but U.S. experts lack information about the degree of steel reinforcement, the concentration of concrete used and other specifics.

—Fire safety system. Is there one and if so, what kind?

—Instrumentation. Herrington said Finland has agreed to put a sophisticated system in Soviet reactors, but it is unclear whether the Cuban plants will have the same one.

—Simulators. The Finns have an outstanding system that operators use to practice, but it is not known whether Soviet reactors or the Cuban ones will have anything comparable, Herrington said.

Ambassador-at-large Richard Kennedy, a board member of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said he has urged Soviet and Cuban authorities to provide the type of information that is in the public domain in this country.

"We have indicated to the government of Cuba...we're prepared to make further information available. We expect them to do the same vis-a-vis the reactors in Cuba," he told Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., chairman of the Governmental Affairs subcommittee on energy, nuclear proliferation and governmental processes.

Kennedy said the United States has made it "absolutely clear" it expects the highest safety standards to be applied to the Cuban reactors. He also said the United States is urging the IAEA, a United Nations agency, to become more involved by making safety suggestions to Cuba.

Both Herrington and Kennedy expressed doubts about the feasibility of international safety standards and inspections.

"All it would do for us is lower our standards because you couldn't bring everyone up to the U.S. standard," Herrington said under questioning. But he said there should be some minimum standards designed to improve reactor safety.

Kennedy said uniform standards are impossible because "specific situations...would not be repeated from one country to another." But he said a set of basic engineering and safety principles could be made mandatory.

State phone system to 'touch' University

By The Collegian Staff

Phone technology will "reach out and touch" K-State when the rotary phones are replaced by touch tone phones in accordance with a statewide telecommunications improvement plan, said Tom Gallagher, director of University computing activities and telecommunications.

The state division of telecommunications is initiating a plan to update telecommunications systems and equipment in all state agencies. The program has been ongoing for the last 2½ years.

K-State is part of the upgrading core project that includes The Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University, The Topeka Capitol complex, the University of Kansas and the KU Medical Center, Gallagher said. Each of the campuses and the complex are being rewired as well as getting new equipment. When the buildings at K-State are all rewired, they will be connected to an on-campus switching center in the power plant.

Gallagher said the total cost for the state's revised telecommunications system is $8.3 million, and K-State's share of the cost is $1.6 million.

The update of the state-owned system is being financed through a state tax on current consumer telephone bills.

The aim of the program is to save the state money that is now paid to Southwestern Bell, he said. Incoming and on-campus calls at K-State are now handled by the Bell System switching center. K-State pays a fee for the switching service. By changing the call switching to an on-campus service, K-State will avoid rate increases.

Gallagher said the project is expected to be completed next summer.

North Korea shows leader on television

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — North Korea showed its "great leader," President Kim Il Sung, on television Tuesday while ignoring reports in rival South Korea that Kim died or was embroiled in a serious power struggle.

A Defense Ministry spokesman in Seoul acknowledged North Korean news media reports that Kim was alive and added: "We are closely watching whether these developments in the North have resulted from a serious internal power struggle or its (the North's) high-level psychological warfare hiding a sinister plot for military provocation."

An Asian diplomat in Pyongyang, reached by The Associated Press by telephone from Peking, said he saw the 74-year-old Kim at Pyongyang Airport on Tuesday "and he is in absolutely good health."

The diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity, added: "Everything is all right in this country, the situation is absolutely normal...There seems to be nothing correct about these reports (of an assassination or power seizure)...It is absolutely normal, there is nothing wrong. He is absolutely normal, he is in good health."

Questions about Kim were raised Monday when the ministry said North Korean propaganda loudspeakers along the demilitarized zone between North and South Korea announced that Kim was killed in a shooting incident.

North Korean embassy officials at various posts abroad denied Kim was dead, but official North Korean media kept silent through Monday.

On Tuesday, Pyongyang's official Korean Central News Agency said Kim had gone to Pyongyang Airport to welcome Mongolian President Jambyn Batmunkh and that cheers for Kim of "Long live the great leader!" burst forth from the thousands of people on hand. The report was monitored in Tokyo.

Japanese television stations showed rare segments from North Korean television of Kim, in a dark overcoat and cap, walking up a gold-bordered red carpet to meet Batmunkh, shaking hands and embracing him. The two walked together back down the carpet. Crowds lining one side cheered as soldiers stood at attention holding rifles with fixed bayonets.

Earlier Tuesday, the South Korean Defense Ministry said North Korean loudspeakers were blaring that O Jin U, North Korea's defense minister, had seized power.

The South's defense minister, Lee Ki-baek, said that as of 10:04 a.m. Tuesday, the loudspeakers were playing somber funeral music and saying "The nation's great star has fallen. Let us glorify his great achievements."

That was about the same time first reports were coming from Pyongyang that Kim was at the airport.

Club card giveaways prompt hearing

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Two Aggieville private clubs have been summoned to appear in court Dec. 3 for violations concerning club card distribution.

Bushwacker's, 531 N. Manhattan Ave., and Rocky Mountain Bonkers, 1216 Laramie St., have been cited with giving away memberships without charging a minimum of $10, said John Lamb, director of the Kansas Alcoholic Beverage Control Unit.

Kansas Statute 41-2601 states: "No membership may be granted within 10 days of the application. Each membership must be renewable annually upon payment of the annual dues of at least $10."

An article appearing in the Collegian Oct. 13 stated that Bushwacker's sent letters to at least eight sororities offering to buy club cards for seniors at least 21 years old, according to social chairwomen and sorority presidents interviewed. Two other sororities were invited to Bushwacker's to receive a free card.

Bonkers has given away club cards for promotional reasons, said Greg Salazar, part owner of Bonkers, in the October article.

Don Ramey, owner of Bushwacker's, and Salazar said they believed that if they paid taxes on the cards, they could give them away.

"We maintained from day one that the fact that they pay taxes doesn't have any bearing," Lamb said Tuesday. "It doesn't change the fact that they gave away memberships."

Lamb, who will hear the case, read from the Kansas Administrative Regulation 14-20-4, which contains the state of Kansas rules and regulations relating to the operation of class B private clubs. Everyone who applies for a club license is issued this book and is sent a memorandum if any changes appear, he said.

Quoting from the book, he said, "A club may mail and distribute an application and receive such application in completed form accompanied by the monetary fee required by statute as a condition precedent to membership."

"They send me books all the time," Ramey said in the earlier article. "If all I did was sit and read, I wouldn't get anything done."

"Ignorance doesn't work well as a defense," Lamb said Tuesday.

Ramey could not be reached, and neither Salazar nor Rich Kriftewirth, part owner of Bushwacker's, would comment on how they would plead at the hearing.

"We'll talk to the ABC about that in the hearing," Kriftewirth said.

The punishment for issuing free club cards usually consists of a fine or temporary shutdown of the establishment. The punishment may vary, depending on the circumstances and the number of cards given away, Lamb said.

"There's no set fine or penalty," he said in the article. "I can recall a fine as low as $100 and a fine as high as $600 and several days suspension."

White-collar criminal deserves punishment

The scales of justice appear to be balancing in favor of white-collar crime, according to a U.S. government study released Sunday by the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

White-collar crime, as defined by this survey, includes forgery, counterfeiting, fraud and embezzlement as opposed to its common-crime equivalent of property crimes such as burglary or car theft.

As the term "white-collar" indicates, these criminals are of higher socioeconomic standing and education than are those, in general, who commit common property crimes. Theodore Roosevelt differentiated the two by saying, as quoted in the Union Programmer, "A man who has never gone to school may steal from a freight car, but if he has a university education, he may steal the whole railroad."

The imbalance in justice between the two types of crime is evident in the difference in prison terms received by those convicted. As the study shows, only 18 percent of those convicted of white-collar crime were sent to prison for more than a year, while common property criminals were given sentences of more than a year 26 percent of the time.

Furthermore, 40 percent of the white-collar criminals were given probation or other non-prison penalties, as compared to 35 percent for common criminals.

Because this survey studied only state felony arrests and convictions, it did not include federal white-collar crimes such as price-fixing and insider trading, which also seldom result in prison time for those convicted. In addition, white-collar convicts usually are put in low-security prisons with more pleasant conditions than their common-crime equivalents.

The justice system should realize that theft is theft regardless of what is violated and who commits the violation. White-collar criminals should not be able to buy their way out of prison terms by paying monetary fines any more than common criminals are able to. American courts should serve justice for the crime committed and should be blind to the status of the accused. The scales of justice need to be rebalanced.

Letters

Positive on Reagan

Editor,

Re: Kirk Caraway's column, "Writer says 'thanks' for comments," in the Nov. 10 Collegian.

I apologize for not including more facts in my letters; but I'm not a trained journalist, merely a freshman who believes in John Wayne, apple pie and the traditional American way.

I won't deny that President Reagan may have tainted the truth occasionally, especially during his pre-election campaign speeches. But one must consider the simple fact that a politician's campaign speeches are worth about as much as a milk bucket under a bull. No democratic government can be supported by a foundation of lies, but consider the international political aspects of making all the available data on an issue public. The enemy would know exactly how much we know, what we intend to do about it, and how they could counter us even before we begin to act.

At first glance, it would appear the government had made a mistake and was attempting a cover-up of a certain issue, but isn't it possible the government had analyzed the reams of data received by its intelligence sources, presented this data to panels and advisory groups of trained professionals, considered the possible options and was waiting for the right political moment to implement its response?

The public has a right to know, but inherent in this right is the government's responsibility to protect its peoples by waiting for the right time to "go public." Hypothetically, how could a general launch a surprise attack if he broadcasts his intentions earlier? Much of the fallacy is generated when the press begins to speculate, adding even more pressure on our leaders. We elected them to do a job, why not trust them and let them do it?

Constructive criticism is very essential to keeping our government free of corruption, but Caraway has been going overboard. He stated that his intentions were to "awaken the apathetic." But by analogy, isn't there a better way to require smoke detectors in public buildings than by setting hotels on fire?

For some strange reason, people tend to believe what they read in newspapers, so why not include some of the positive aspects of Reagan's term, like Grenada, anti-terrorist responses and tax reform? Reagan, by law, cannot be re-elected and has done nothing worthy of being impeached, so why continue to harp about the negative aspects of his presidency. Much good also has come out of his administration, so why not go back to the old-fashioned way of reporting and cover both sides of the story?

Requests for grades

Editor,

Re: Justin Hockersmith's letter, "Pledges' grades count," in Friday's Collegian.

As an instructor who received several requests for the same type of report he describes, I have some suggestions for him. First, the fraternities could take an example from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. The athletic department regularly checks on the grade status of its students. Instructors receive a formal written request on letterhead stationary from the department. Included is a form for the instructor to fill out and a note explaining the importance and reason for the form. And, finally they request the form be returned to the department, not to the student.

As an instructor, I am more than willing to consult with a student about his current grade or his future prospects in my class. On the other hand, when I am approached by a student who says, "I need a letter for my house about how I am doing in your class," my response is, "What is it for, what information should be included and finally whom do I address it to?" My experience has shown the students requesting the letters don't know the answers to these simple questions. This makes me hesitant to write a letter and address it "To whom it may concern."

I also don't like to write out a formal statement of grade standing, sign my name and return it to the student. I have no control over how it is altered or what it may be used for after the student collects it from me.

If the fraternities are serious about this, I suggest they formalize their approach. First, create a form for each instructor to use. Second, include a letter of introduction. Third, have the student present the request personally to the instructor — this solves potential legal problems. Fourth, include a stamped, addressed envelope to return the statement to the house. Fifth, require your pledges to write a formal thank you to each instructor who returns a grade status report. Remember such reports are not part of the instructors' job description and can take a large amount of time if many are requested.

I think if you follow such suggestions your return rate will jump dramatically.

U.S. commercialism invades Paris

Collegian Columnist

People who travel abroad for the first time often have a picture in their mind of what the country and its culture will resemble.

Sometimes these images are accurate. But, as I discovered on a two-day excursion to Paris in January, they can also be naive visions reminiscent of the scenes on embossed postcards.

My journey began at the train station in London. Although exhausted from our whirlwind tour of England, I and two friends climbed aboard the train to Dover, eager to review our French vocabulary.

As the white cliffs came into view, we reviewed the geography of Paris and debated over what sights we could see in one day. We wanted to see and do things that gave us an authentic representation of Paris' history and culture.

At the top of the next day's itinerary was the Eiffel Tower and the Arc de Triomphe. Margaret demanded that we make a running tour of the Louvre, while I advocated a walking tour of the Jardins de Tuilliere, the gardens outside the Louvre.

To complete our 12-hour walking tour, we decided to visit Notre Dame de Paris, a Gothic cathedral, and a smaller chapel before taking a leisurely stroll along the Seine River. As the grand finale, we hoped to go to the Moulin Rouge that evening.

As each leg of the journey brought us nearer our final destination, I became more excited. Every kilometer traveled brought me one step closer to the culture I had always longed to experience.

Stepping onto the platform at the Gare du Nord, the northern rail station in Paris, I heard a woman announce departure times over the intercom in partially distinguishable French. When we strode outside into the damp night air, I inhaled the aromas drifting from the sidewalk cafe while my eyes took their first look at Paris by night. Ah, Paris! C'est manifique!

My enthusiasm was so uncontrollable that I insisted on touring the city by night. Russ and I left Margaret in the hotel and began a haphazard journey through the city.

We began our walking tour on a main artery near the rail station. The drizzle had stopped, but a light fog hung in the air. Street lamps lined either side of the boulevard, stretching down the hill into the horizon. The light haze created by the lamps brightened the night.

The sidewalk cafes we strolled past looked bright and cheery. Couples lounged at small, round tables inside the glass-enclosed patios, while waiters with white cloths draped over one arm brought bottles of wine to the customers for their inspection. Outside some cafes were venders selling crepes with chocolate or fruit fillings.

Being adventurous people, we veered off on a side street. Lining both sides of the street were three- and four-story stone buildings.

On the ground floor were small shops and entrances to the apartments above. Iron railings designed in elaborate patterns of flowers and fruit enclosed the small balconies of the residences.

Peering down the street, I saw the faint outline of a large, square arch. We later learned that the arch was Porte St.-Martin, erected in 1674 to commemorate the defeat of the German, Dutch and Spanish armies.

When we approached the object, I stood in awe. Standing in the center of an intersection, it dominated the surrounding low-lying buildings. On its face were carved figures representative of a war long past.

Gazing upon this miniature monument, I was impressed with the grandeur and style of the arch. Although quite large, it was not overbearing. Moreover, I concluded the craftmanship had been superior because most of the detailing on the sculpture was still very distinctive.

Desiring to continue our scenic tour, we walked through the arch. But I had a rude awakening.

On the opposite corner of the intersection stood another proud symbol of U.S. culture — a McDonald's restaurant. The garish yellow and red protruded from beneath a canopy. Inside were the same stainless steel counter tops, machine-crafted tables and fake-wood swivel chairs found in the United States.

In my eyes, the authenticity of Paris had been marred by the institution of this element. Paris' hold on me would no longer be as firm.

The United States had invaded Europe. But instead of using armies and artillery as we had in the past, we invaded with fast-food chains and other hollow examples of our culture that fail to blend with the realness of Europe.

Unfortunately, this invasion has been as successful as the others.

Republican grip on power loosens

DAVID BRODER
Syndicated Columnist

WASHINGTON — Shortly after the results of the midterm election were clear, Edward J. Rollins, manager of President Reagan's 1984 campaign, remarked, "It's going to be hard for us to think of ourselves as the governing party again."

Rollins put his finger on the real danger to the GOP in the next two years. At a time when neither political party can really claim the confidence of the American people, Republicans are just as likely to lapse into minority-party psychology as the Democrats are to delude themselves into believing they have once again become the majority.

For the past six years, Republicans have enjoyed the unusual sensation of being separated from their long minority-party status. With a popular president in the White House and their first Senate majority in a generation, with polls showing them approaching parity with Democrats in the voters' basic party identification and with young people increasingly Republican in their inclination, the GOP had reason to think of itself as the new power center of American politics.

The midterm election knocked the props from under some of those heady assumptions. Republicans' six-year control of the Senate was ended by an unexpected eight-seat Democratic pickup. The old Democratic coalition showed up to vote — especially in the South — and young people either stayed home or voted Democratic by the same margins as their parents. The Senate losses were offset by the addition of eight governorships. But in legislatures, which will draw the lines for House elections of the 1990s, Republicans sank further into minority status.

All this constitutes a heavy blow to Republican morale and raises the clear danger that the party's congressional leaders will revert to opposition-party tactics that were their predecessors' specialty — and their curse — for two generations from 1930 to 1978.

Democrats won most of the elections for those five decades by ridiculing and reviling a succession of Republican congressional leaders who were more renowned for saying "no" than for anything else. Franklin Delano Roosevelt campaigned against "Martin, Barton and Fish," three Republican congressional leaders of the 1930s, and John Kennedy lampooned the "Ev (Dirksen) and Charley (Halleck) Show" as a way of pointing out the Republicans' penchant for negativism.

These historical memories became relevant again when the voters, bless them, decided to disregard the positive efforts and achievements of the Senate's Republican majority and dismiss its leaders from their committee chairmanships and floor leadership positions.

They did this accidentally by defeating several of the weaker freshmen senators who had been swept in by Reagan's coattails in 1980. Of the Republican incumbents who lost in the election, only one, Sen. Slade Gorton of Washington, could fairly be said to have made a significant contribution to the Senate Republican record.

But the effect of the election was to say there is no political reward for being as responsible as Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., budget chairman Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., and Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar, R-Ind., among others, have been. They balanced the obligation of party loyalty to the president with their courageous efforts to resolve the contradictions in the administration's fiscal policy and the misjudgments in its foreign policy.

The Senate Republicans were a "third force" in Washington who had, as Alan Ehrenhalt of Congressional Quarterly said, "proved they were more than competent as the governing party." But that message never was delivered. And as a result, to quote Ehrenhalt again, "The 1986 Senate elections were a Republican disaster that need not have happened."

But it has occurred, and now there will be a tendency for Republicans to forget about responsibility and governing and go back to the guerilla tactics of the past. The president's meager domestic program (with yet another foredoomed effort for the balanced-budget and line-item veto amendments) will offer little in the way of a rallying point.

Dole as minority leader will have one eye on the 1988 presidential primaries. He may well think that serving as Reagan's body guard against any Senate Democratic initiatives is the surest way to win the hearts of the activist conservatives who are so important in those primaries.

House Minority Leader Bob Michel, R-Ill., has no personal motive for high-profile obstructionism. But the firebrand House conservatives who have been nipping at his heels the past four years will try to push him into being a human roadblock. They would rather sharpen the issues for 1988 than search for compromises with Democrats on budget and foreign-policy questions facing Congress in 1987.

All these forces will tend to build an "opposition psychology" among congressional Republicans, to the detriment of Republican chances in the election of 1988.

Prospects are not bad for a Republican victory in that year. The polls show voters still regard the GOP as the party best equipped to handle the major issues of the economy, defense and foreign policy. But if the Republican record the next two years is one of negativism and opposition, that confidence is likely to disappear.

Cancer society favors 1-day Smokeout

By KELLI CARR
Collegian Reporter

On Thursday, 54 million Americans are being encouraged to do something that may change their lives — quit smoking for one day.

The 10th annual observance of the Great American Smokeout, sponsored by the American Cancer Society, encourages anyone who smokes to refrain from smoking on this day.

This year's smokeout is a special celebration of the national event. Anyone who has quit smoking during the past 10 years is asked by the American Cancer Society to be treated as a celebrity, the star of the show on Smokeout day.

"As far as campus involvement in the Smokeout goes, Lafene (Student Health Center) will sponsor a table in the Union and in the residence halls (that will be) providing handouts and information about the Smokeout, the smoking policies on this campus and the effects of smoking in relation to one's health," said Cindy Burke, Lafene staff assistant.

The goal of the 1986 Smokeout is to have at least one in every five smokers give up smoking from midnight tonight to midnight Thursday. Those getting a late start are permitted to extend the 24-hour period as long as necessary past the midnight deadline to get in one full day.

Burke said campus participation numbers in the Smokeout are unknown.

"It is a general consensus among participants and those sponsoring the Smokeout that the one-day national event does stimulate interest, and there are a number of people who stop smoking on this one day and continue not to smoke," Burke said. "Knowing that there are others experiencing the same things you are and providing support makes it somehow easier for smokers to stop smoking for one day."

Smokeout 1985 was observed in a variety of ways by the American Cancer Society's 58 divisions and more than 3,000 units across the country. In addition to national programs, such as "Adopt-A-Smoker," which was used in most units, local observances included The Great Texas Spitout, launched against the hazards of smokeless tobacco; a ban on smoking for all police officers in Holden, Mass., making it the first unionized department in the nation to prohibit smoking of on- and off-duty police officers; and the ACS Washington State division's Carrot Club and "Come To Carrot Country" themes spoofing well-known cigarette ads and urging smokers to choose a carrot instead of a smoke.

Smokeout '85 set an all-time record for participation in the day-long event. More than 23 million of America's smokers tried to quit for just one day.

Police arrest man in bouquet bombing

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A man identified by police as the tuxedo-clad bomber who delivered a booby-trapped bouquet that injured two women was arrested Tuesday at a country house he reportedly shared with the estranged husband of one of the victims.

Shaun Small, 27, was taken into custody in rural Lake County on a federal warrant charging him with detonation of an explosive device involving personal injury. Bail was set at $100,000.

The bomber allegedly tried to deliver a second flower arrangement to one of the victims' parents a short time after Monday's explosion, but the woman's 78-year-old father turned him away.

Lake County sheriff's Capt. Glen Perkins said Small was arrested without incident when he left a house and got into a car in Clearlake Park, about 75 miles northeast of San Francisco.

He said the FBI had asked officers to watch the house because it was believed Small was sharing it with longtime friend Peter Pilaski.

Pilaski is the estranged husband of one of the bombing victims, Melanie Pilaski, 41. FBI agent Robert Delinski said Tuesday that authorities also were searching for Pilaski, but only to question him.

Authorities said the bombing apparently stemmed from an ugly divorce proceeding between the Pilaskis. Melanie Pilaski's father, Willard Swanstrom, said Small recently threatened his daughter because she had frozen the couple's bank accounts.

Also injured was Melanie Pilaski's co-worker, Pamela Castro, 42, of San Bruno.

An all-points bulletin for Small was issued less than an hour after the bomb exploded in the GSA office on the 33rd floor of the downtown Tishman Building, where Melanie Pilaski is a supervisor handling federal government supply surpluses, said San Francisco Police Officer Dave Ambrose.

He said Castro told officers she heard the bouquet of dried flowers had been left at the GSA mailroom on the 32nd floor and she carried them up to Pilaski's desk.

"I placed the basket of flowers between Melanie and myself," she was quoted as saying in the police report. "Melanie reached into the basket, grabbing a wallet-sized box in silver wrapping paper with pink ribbon. When Melanie lifted the small box, it exploded."

Ambrose said a witness who knew Small said she saw him deliver the flowers to the GSA office. That witness and others told police the man was dressed in a white tuxedo and a derby and was wearing makeup, including eyeliner, and what appeared to be a fake beard and mustache, the officer said.

He said officers also learned that Small may have been headed for the El Cerrito home of Melanie Pilaski's parents.

Taxi driver Peter Chandler told police he picked up a man, who he believed to be a florist, at the El Cerrito station of the BART subway system and drove him to the Swanstroms' home.

Swanstrom said he was watching television and had just seen a picture of his daughter being taken out of the building on a stretcher.

"This fellow came to the front door," Swanstrom said. "I recognized him as Peter's henchman. He said 'Some flowers for Mr. Swanstrom.' I was already alert for anything like that, so I said 'Take them away, take them away,' and I slammed the door."

Swanstrom said the man kept his back to him, "but I know his build. I could tell by his voice that it was him."

The man later was spotted around the home of Swanstrom's son in Pinole, but apparently found no one home, police and Swanstrom said.

Swanstrom said Small had been a friend of Pilaski for eight or nine years and had worked at various apartment complexes and motels Pilaski had managed.

"He kind of helps him like an apprentice there, plumbing and carpenter work," Swanstrom said. "He just does anything Peter says."

He said Small had threatened his daughter about three weeks ago, after she had the couple's joint bank accounts frozen because of the divorce proceedings.

IRS urges workers to file new tax form

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Internal Revenue Service on Tuesday urged workers to file a new tax form as soon as possible so that the amount withheld from their paychecks can be adjusted to reflect the landmark tax overhaul.

Unless a new Form W-4 is filed, IRS Commissioner Lawrence B. Gibbs told reporters, millions of people will find their taxes are being under-withheld and could face penalties.

The new W-4 is only slightly changed from earlier versions, but the accompanying instructions and worksheets that many employees will have to use are considerably more complicated.

"Drafting the W-4 form was a classic struggle between simplicity and fairness, between taking the easy way out and taking steps to ensure that the appropriate amount of tax is withheld," Gibbs said.

"Going from two pages to four means a more complicated looking form and the greater likelihood of some public confusion but doing so also means people's withholding will be reasonable close to the actual amount of tax owed," he added.

IRS officials said the new forms and instructions will be shipped soon to employers for distribution to their workers.

Congress ordered the new W-4 forms as part of the landmark tax overhaul enacted last month. That law, most of which will take effect Jan. 1, restricts or eliminates several widely used deductions.

Unless withholding is changed to reflect the new law, a worker who has been claiming large itemized deductions might find at the end of 1987 that too little tax had been withheld and could face a penalty from the IRS.

The new tax law requires all workers to file a new form by next Oct. 1. Workers who fail to comply will have their tax withheld as if they had no dependents; in many cases, that would result in over-withholding.

Arthur Altman, an IRS official in change of forms, estimated that for more than one-half of all workers filling out the new W-4 form would be unchanged from the old form. It would be somewhat more complicated for workers who claim large itemized deductions or a child-care credit. The biggest task would face workers who have a second job, a working spouse or such income as alimony and dividends.

Board selects editor, advertising manager

By The Collegian Staff

The Board of Student Publications announced the spring semester Collegian editor and advertising manager Tuesday afternoon after interviewing the applicants.

Jonie Trued, senior in agricultural journalism, was named editor and Sheila Hutinett, senior in journalism and mass communications, was named advertising manager.

"Jonie will do a wonderful job," said Chris Stewart, fall semester editor of the Collegian and senior in journalism and mass communications. "It's been great having her on the staff (as managing editor). She'll be a good, solid editor."

Trued said minor changes in the newsroom will occur. These changes will involve the staffing of the newsroom and changing the focus of news on campus, she said.

"How the newsroom will be staffed will depend on where the strengths of the applicants are," Trued said.

"I think Sheila (Hutinett) will do a good job," said Patti Hannan, fall semester advertising manager and senior in journalism and mass communications.

"I want to progressively pursue regional accounts. It's an area we can really improve on," Hutinett said.

Trued and Hutinett will begin selecting their staffs immediately. Staff applications are open to anyone on campus. The application deadline is Monday for advertising and Dec. 1 for news staff positions.

"I want to stress that more students get involved — it's good experience," Hutinett said.

Hutinett is accepting applications for an assistant advertising manager, six account representatives and several graphic artists.

Trued will be interviewing applicants for a news editor, managing editor, desk editors, copy editors and staff writers.

Both staffs will be announced Dec. 8.

Of his fall news staff, Stewart said, "I think it's the best staff we've had since I've been in school. It's the most cohesive staff — we've pulled together."

Group urges post-secondary reform

Changes seen in governing education

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — With only one dissent, a state economic development task force endorsed a plan Tuesday that calls for sweeping changes in the way the state's post-secondary educational instutitions are governed.

Under the plan, the State Board of Education would be stripped of its current power to oversee operations of community colleges and post-secondary vocational schools. That function instead would be handled by one of two newly created boards under supervision of the State Board of Regents.

The report by the Legislative Commission on Economic Development's Education Task Force also calls for the board of regents to take on a new role, the establishment of a new board to govern the state universities and Kansas Technical Institute, and appointment of a commissioner of higher education.

Rep. Phil Kline, R-Overland Park, chairman of the 13-member task force, said the panel has been advised that the Legislature could implement the proposed changes without amending the Kansas Constitution.

Kline said the report would be presented Dec. 8 to the full economic development commission for its consideration. The commission, in turn, will forward recommendations it approves to the 1987 Legislature.

If the education governance recommendations advance to the Legislature, Kline said he believes there is a good chance the changes could be enacted this coming session.

A member of the board of regents, Sandra McMullen of Hutchinson, was the only person on the task force who opposed adoption of the report. McMullen objected to what she contended would be unnecessary new layers of bureaucracy that the report recommends.

"I approve of the overall coordination of higher education," said McMullen. "However, I don't think there's any real advantage to all of these new boards and staffs."

McMullen added that she supports the concept of the regents taking control of vocational-technical schools and the state's 19 community colleges.

The task force's recommendations include:

— Redefining the mission of the board of regents from a governing body to a coordinating board, which would conduct master planning for post-secondary education, approve new educational programs, review budget requests and make requests for post-secondary education funding. Regents would remain gubernatorial appointees.

— Creation of two new seven-member boards, under jurisdiction of the board of regents, which would be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate. One board would take over the duties the State Board of Education now handles in relation to vocational schools and community colleges.

— Continuation of local community college boards in their present form. However, the report says that whenever state financing of community colleges reaches 50 percent of their expenditures "steps should be taken to bring the governance of community colleges under greater state control."

— Charging the board of regents with coordinating Washburn University's role within the state's post-secondary education system. Washburn would remain an independent institution outside of the state university system.

— Appointing a new chief executive officer for the board of regents, which would be called the commissioner of higher education. The commissioner would recommend the appointment of university presidents, set the regents' agenda, review academic programs and budget requests and make presentations to the governor and Legislature.

We've asked a number of people on campus this question:

Jim Bob Bodene, junior in animal husbandry, said, "Ain't it one of them there country waterin' holes?"

Hay-Aid benefit showcases wild, crazy acts

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

What began as a wild and crazy idea called "Hay-Aid" has become an annual showcase of talent from the residence halls to help the underprivileged in the Manhattan community during the Christmas season.

Hay-Aid, a talent show fund-raiser, began at 10 a.m. and continued past 10 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Little Theatre. Each hall was responsible for providing talent during its time slot.

"This is an all-hall effort," said Steve Woolf, director of Edwards Hall and organizer of the event last year. "At the beginning of the year, we went to the ARH (Association of Residence Halls) and asked for their support...They bring out their dumb, good, wonderful and awful acts."

The brave and daring donned blinking Christmas lights and sang "Jingle Bells," completing the ensemble with sleigh bells for a sound effect.

The bizarre were dressed as nerds in highwater pants, a multitude of pens in their pockets and large bow ties.

Others sang and played guitars. One even taped the lyrics to his legs.

"We're crazy," said Dave Rogowski, Haymaker Hall staff member and fifth-year senior in architectural engineering.

The project was expected to surpass last year's gift of $500 to the Flint Hills Bread Basket. A dollar was accepted at the door from walk-ins, and Hay-Aid tickets were sold in each hall.

"We are trying to raise $1,000 this year," said Tom O'Connor, freshman in architectural engineering. "We don't require you to pay at the door, but some people came in and just handed us a dollar just to donate. That's neat."

At the end of the evening, Kirk Rogg, coordinator of the this year's project and assistant director of Haymaker, projected the proceeds to be around $700. Rogg is a senior in psychology.

The project started last year when the Haymaker Hall staff began talking about the hall becoming involved with a community service project.

"We felt the hall should be involved in community service. A lot of people go hungry in Manhattan. There is a big need for more money," Woolf said. "We started coming up with really wild ideas, and we went with Hay-Aid after they had Live-Aid and Farm-Aid."

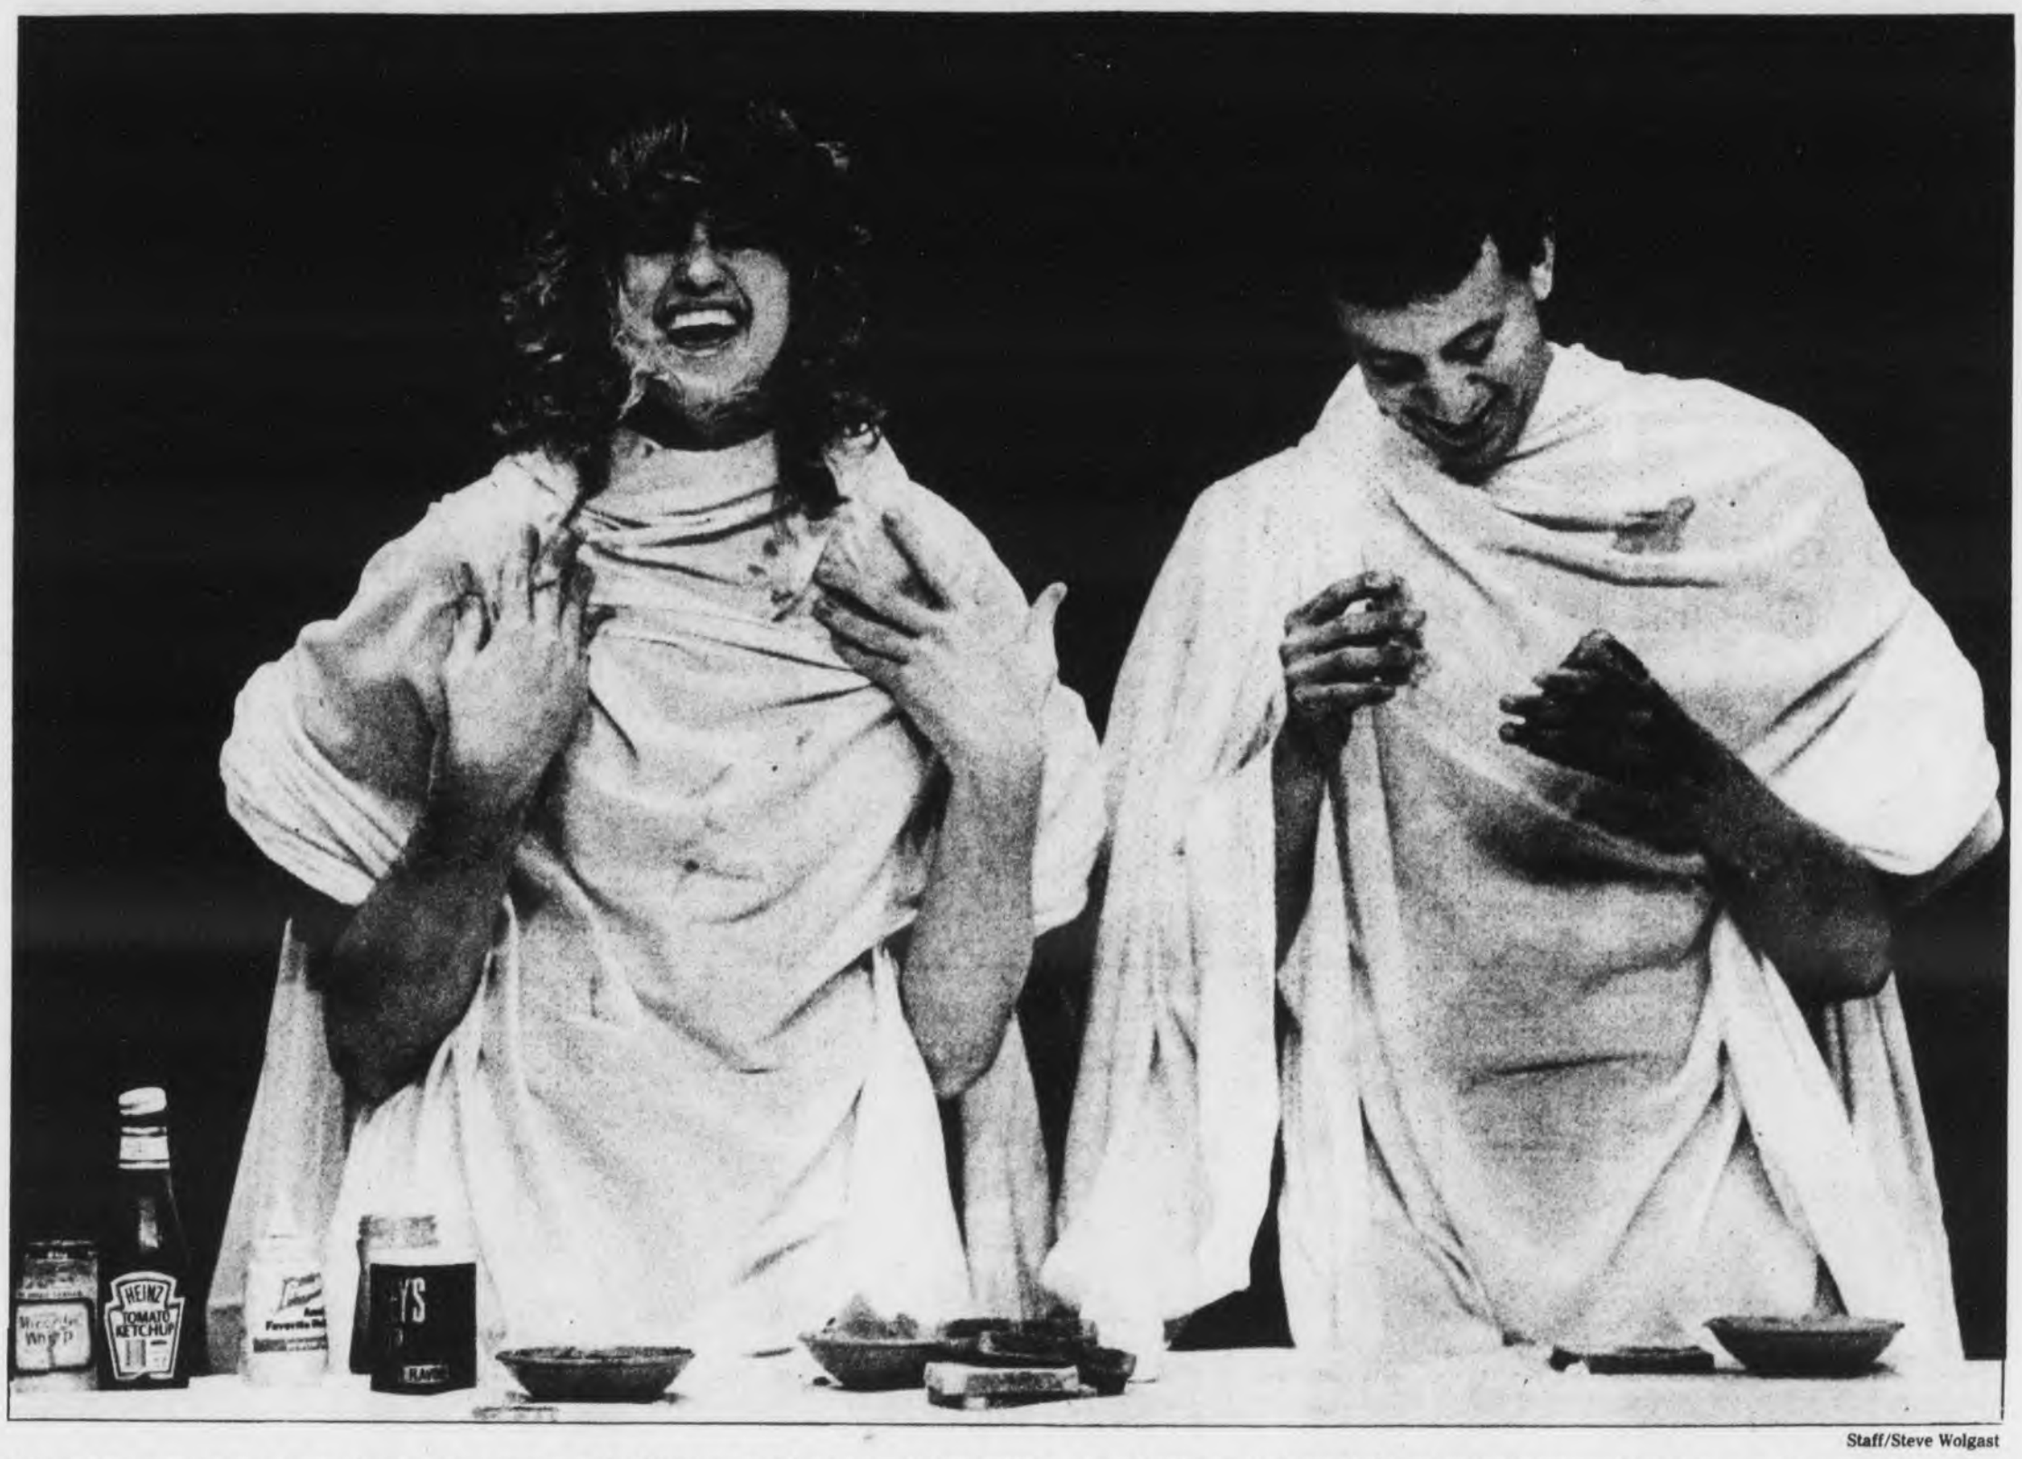
Woolf, who was last year's assistant director of Haymaker Hall, planned the first show.

"It was a heck of a job and we're going to try to keep it going. It's part of the assistant director's job now," Woolf said.

Helping Rogg put the show together were Haymayker Hall's floor vice presidents. Rogg also was one of the singing participants wrapped in Christmas lights.

KQLA broadcast from the Little Theatre throughout the day, O'Connor said. Many Manhattan-area sponsors donated prizes to help the Hay-Aid project. Prizes were awarded to people in the audience who answered trivia questions correctly.

"Last year, it was difficult to get sponsors for the project. We had maybe three," Woolf said. "But then, the mayor named an official Hay-Aid day last year. This year, everyone was more committed to the idea."



The audience was not content just to sit and be entertained. They participated by offering encouragement and approval to the acts, and when a spotlight failed to shine upon the lead singer in the band "Whitestone," flashlights were turned on to light the singer's act.

"I came to see everyone make fools of themselves," said Kim Forslund, senior in interior design. "But there were a lot of good singers, too."

Two groups tied for first place and donated the $75 first- and second-place prize money to the project. The two groups were "Huey Lewis and the Nerds," made up of Haymaker staff, and Haymaker residents Bob Copple, junior in industrial engineering, and Darin Phelps, junior in pre-professional education, who gave a dramatic reading of Plato in Greek sign language.

Third place and $15 went to Ed-

Murder mystery game tries capturing student imaginations

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

Margaret Louise Barnhill died under mysterious circumstances last night. The sheriff suspects foul play and is interrogating all who were in her house the night of her death.

Rest assured, Barnhill is a fictional character. So is the sheriff and the suspects in her murder. But to those playing Murder Mystery Party, the characters are as real as the other people playing the game.

Murder Mystery Party represents the latest attempt to capture the attention and imagination of college students. Each player assumes the role of one of eight characters and attempts to solve the "murder" of a fictional person.

Steve Malone, freshman in electrical engineering, is a sales representative for University Games, the company which distributes the game. Malone said he thinks the reason for the game's success on other college campuses is the social aspect the game offers.

"(The game) gives everyone a chance to interact and socialize, and it is not as competitive as most other games," he said.

The game was created by Patricia Stewert and Edna Hill Maples, two former child psychologists. Bob Moog and Chris Lehman of University Games changed the game slightly and now market and manufacture it.

The history of murder mystery games goes back to the European parlor games of the upper class, Malone said. The royalty of England and France would often challenge each other with murder scenarios while sipping brandy.

Today's game includes invitations, name tags, a record of the "murder," rules, background information and clues.

Participants are assigned a role to play by the host of the party. Invitations with the character's name and a brief synopsis of the murder situation are sent to each player about a week before the party.

"This gives the players a chance to get to know their character and maybe come up with a costume," Malone said.

In "The Willing Dead" edition of the game, characters range from an overly dependent, kleptomaniac son to a blackmailing butler.

Once at the party, the players listen to a recording and prepare themselves for their role. The purpose of the record is much the same as the invitation — it briefly sets the scenario for the party by summarizing the murder. Then the host reads the will and other evidence. Finally, the players are provided with background information on their character and introduce themselves to the group.

The game continues through four stages or "chapters" in which each character circulates throughout the group asking questions and revealing certain information about themselves. All the players, except for the murderer, are required to truthfully answer questions but are not required to give information if not asked.

When all the information is revealed, the players get together and try to determine the "murderer." The author's solution is read to verify their conclusions.

There are seven games available: "The Willing Dead," "The Icicle Twist," "Revenge in Rome," "Intrigue at Sparkling Water," "Murder on Misty Island," "When an Angel Dies" and "Konan Castle's Revenge." Each game has one solution and may be played only once.

Each game retails for $16 and is available at the Union Bookstore and The Master Gamer, 1125 Laramie St.

Report reveals $75 million bonus earned by shuttle booster maker

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Morton Thiokol Inc., the maker of space shuttle boosters, was not penalized for numerous and "long-festering" problems with the rockets but became eligible for a $75 million incentive award from NASA, a congressional report says.

"One must not fault Thiokol for collecting the bonus," said the recent report by the House Science and Technology Committee. "One must fault NASA for allowing the bonus to be collected at all."

The award was earned before the January destruction of the shuttle Challenger, which was blamed on a leak in a joint on the right rocket booster, Robert Ketcham, general counsel of the committee, said Tuesday.

He said Morton Thiokol had received $34.1 million of the $75 million under the award-incentive plan and that he was told by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration that there have been no payments since May.

"So, I guess it was April," Ketcham said, adding that "they are not paying for anything that happened after January."

NASA's figures were slightly different.

NASA spokeswoman Barbara Selby said she was trying to get the facts behind the assertions in the report, which was issued Oct. 29.

"Under its NASA contract, Thiokol was never penalized for any of the numerous SRB (solid rocket booster) flight anomalies," said the report. "The booster joint had never worked as intended."

There had been more than 25 instances of leaks past the booster's O-ring seals at the time of accident, the report said, and the rate had been increasing since Morton Thiokol — the sole source for the boosters — had received its production contract in 1983.

Eight students earn top FFA award in recognition of leadership ability

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

K-State students were among those recognized as "Leaders for the New Fields of Agriculture" at the 59th National Future Farmers of America Convention in Kansas City, Mo., Thursday through Saturday.

The American Farmer Degree, the highest degree an FFA member can receive, was earned by eight K-State students from the College of Agriculture.

"The sixteen members from the Kansas FFA Association who were awarded the American Farmer are the largest group we've had in Kansas," said Earl Wineinger, state FFA executive director.

Fewer than 2 percent of FFA members will earn the award this year. In addition to demonstrated leadership ability, the member must have earned $5,000 through an agricultural occupational experience program, Wineinger said.

The recipients from K-State are Steve Brandyberry, junior in animal sciences and industry; Wally Brockhoff, junior in agricultural economics; Kim Buethe, junior in animal sciences and industry; Stacey Campbell, junior in agricultural journalism; Phil Kirk, sophomore in agricultural economics; Melanie Mainquist, sophomore in animal sciences and industry; Steve Spiegel, junior in agricultural economics; and Daryl Yarrow, junior in agricultural education.

The convention also marked the conclusion of an official term for Rick Malir, who served as 1985-86 national FFA president. Malir, who took a one-year leave of absence from K-State to fulfill his duties, is a junior in agricultural economics.

During his term, Malir traveled more than 200,000 miles, speaking at state FFA conventions and chapter banquets and discussing agriculture with leaders in government and agribusiness. The year also included a tour of the agriculture and industry of Japan.

Greg Doud, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, was one of 10 national finalists recognized at the convention for "Achievement in Volunteerism."

Williams quits football team

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Randy Williams, K-State's starting quarterback all season, has left the team, head coach Stan Parrish disclosed Tuesday. Parrish's statement confirmed rumors which had been swirling about Williams' status since the beginning of the week.

"I think the best way to put it would be a personal decision on his part," Parrish said.

While Parrish said he did not know the exact reason or reasons Williams quit, he did say, "To be honest, I don't think it's any one thing when a guy makes a large decision like that. Obviously, it's not something that happened in five seconds."

"It's kind of something that had built up throughout the year," said Williams, a Jacksonville, Fla., native. "In the Iowa State game, getting pulled out...helped make my decision easier.

"A lot of things went into the decision. This isn't a decision you make overnight. I just figured it was time for me to move on and concentrate on getting my degree."

Williams' replacement, junior Tim Hanson, had mixed reactions to the announcement.

"It feels good (to start)," he said, "I really like it. I'm ready to do well this week.

"I felt bad that he (quit) because Randy and I are both good friends. We've talked in depth during the year about the situation, how he was really getting burned out on football. And he's been in Kansas for four years, and really hasn't had a chance to be home at all."

Hanson replaced Williams after Williams fumbled on the first play from scrimmage in Saturday's 48-19 loss to the Cyclones.

Parrish said he had spoken with Williams earlier in the week, though Williams had not attended any practices.

"We had a good talk," Parrish said. "I think we've had a strong relationship. I think he's done a very good job for us, I really do. I was proud of his effort."

Parrish said he did not regret his decision to insert Hanson against the Cyclones.

"I've been the most supportive guy in the world of (Williams)," he said, "and I think he's done a good job. But it's like a manager in baseball — you've got to go to your bullpen once in awhile. I just thought we needed a shot in the arm."

For the year, Williams completed 88 of 197 passes for 1,069 yards. Williams threw four touchdown passes while tossing 13 interceptions. His most productive game of the year came against Texas Tech when Williams racked up 239 yards of total offense, 218 of those coming through the air.

Williams was named the starting quarterback after spring practice by Parrish and remained the starter until this week. Hanson was listed at No. 3 on the depth chart behind senior John Welch, who was sidelined with a broken after the Northern Iowa game Sept. 13.

Parrish will find himself with an

Quarterback Randy Williams will no longer be Stan Parrish's starting quarterback as junior Tim Hanson will start in Saturday's season finale against Colorado. Williams, who started the first 10 games, quit the team.

Colorado game to end hard work for 'Cats' seniors

By RON RENO

Things were looking up for the K-State football program after the 1982 season.

The Wildcats had just turned in the first winning season in 12 years and had made their first-ever bowl appearance. Seniors Todd Moody, Jeff Hurd and Bob Bessert were all freshmen that year, just beginning careers which they hoped would enjoy similiar success down the road.

Saturday's game against Colorado will mark the end of those careers, and no such bowl appearance awaits. In fact, since that season, the Wildcats have managed only a 9-33-1 record.

Bessert and Moody were redshirted that year, and Hurd was granted a hardship by the NCAA after competing in the first four games, so none actually participated in the bowl game. Still, all had high expectations for the coming seasons.

"After that, I really thought things were going to turn around for our program," said Hurd, who plays defensive tackle.

Each man said the only disappointment he had about playing football for the Wildcats was that they didn't continue the success of the '82 campaign.

"I don't have any regrets about coming here," said Bessert, an offensive guard. "It was a tough program to work with, and I've enjoyed playing against the people I have and playing with the people on this team."

All had plenty of fond memories from their years on the gridiron. Victories against the archrival Kansas Jayhawks, the experience of playing major-college football and the friendships established were some of those mentioned.

Though this season has held its share of disappointments, none are eager to hear the final gun sound Saturday.

"It's an emotional game because it's the last time (we will be) putting on a purple and white uniform for Kansas State," Hurd said. "After Saturday, when the final whistle blows, it's something that you'll never get the chance to do again. Any time you lose something like that, you're going to have some sad feelings."

Head coach Stan Parrish said the team will dedicate Saturday's game to its seniors.

"Those kids have done a heck of a job for us all year," he said. "They've really hung tough."

Hurd said that despite the lack of success on the field, he has learned several valuable lessons from his experience at K-State.

"Being in this program and not giving up, it teaches you about life itself. Things are not going to go your way all the time, but you have to keep on fighting no matter what. That's one of the big things I've learned since I've been here," he said.

Despite the fact that the record doesn't show significant improvement under first-year Coach Parrish, the three said the program is headed in the right direction.

"What hurts me as a senior was that we thought we could pull off a winning season and we didn't, and

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — When Johnny Orr opted to switch jobs from Michigan to Iowa State six years ago, critics said he was taking a step backwards in his basketball coaching career.

Now, Orr can stand tall with pride. He told reporters Sunday at the Big Eight Preseason Press Day that his move to Ames was in his best interests and he has never regretted his decision.

Orr's brand of basketball, in simple terms, is loved at Iowa State. Most of all, his success is appreciated by the Cyclone fans.

When Orr opened his career at ISU during the 1980-81 season, despite losing two more games than the previous team did under Lynn Nance, attendance increased 3,000 over the prior year's average. Now, a ticket into the 14,020-seat James H. Hilton Coliseum is a hot commodity in Ames.

"We've sold all the seats already. Basketball is at a fever pitch in Ames," said a boastful Orr.

And the fans have good reason to fill Hilton to the rafters. Many pollsters have placed the Cyclones in the nation's preseason top 20. Many have also predicted 6-foot-5 forward Jeff Grayer will be an All-American at the end of the season.

Orr has no doubts about his swingman's ablilities. Grayer, a junior, has made tremendous strides to become a complete basketball player since he was recruited by Orr out of Northwestern High School in Flint, Mich.

"He's a great player and a great person. I think he's one of the finest players in the nation," Orr said. "He's so strong and quick. You look at the films and he never has his shots blocked. He can dribble, shoot, rebound. He's become a much better and much more versatile player than we thought he could be."

All of the hoopla concerning the Cyclones as a team and Grayer as a player comes on the heals of Iowa State's most succesful season. After stunning many by beating both of the Big Eight's national powerhouses — Kansas and Oklahoma — in Ames, the Cyclones finished all alone in second place at the end of the Big Eight race.

After that, a berth in the National Collegiate Athletic Association's tournament was on tap for the feisty Cyclones. Iowa State squeeked by Miami (Ohio) University in the first round and then ran into a school with which Orr was all too familar — Michigan.

Orr is still in the clouds about the Cyclones' victory over his former employer and Big Ten Conference champion. The win not only surprised many, but it brought national recognition to basketball at Iowa State and in the Big Eight.

"Our win over Michigan was as big a victory as the conference has had in a long time," Orr said.

The dream came to an end in the "Sweet 16" when North Carolina State brought Iowa State back to reality with a 70-66 win. But that was last season, and Orr feels even better about this year's team.

Mix Grayer's abilities with a fine returning cast and it is easy to see why so many pollsters are going crazy over the Cyclones.

Center Sam Hill, in Orr's eyes, is the best defensive center in the conference. His always-hustle form of basketball often gets him in foul trouble, but it more often puts a fire under his teammates.

Match Hill's inside abilities with guard Gary Thompkins' outside ablities and it is clear that the Cyclones' opponents will have trouble figuring out how to defeat them.

"We're definitely going to be in the race for the conference title — there is no doubt about it," Orr said.

Orr knows his team is good and he is confident that they belong with the nation's 20 best, but he also realizes the level of competition in the conference is at its highest. But, Orr said, if everything falls in place, his Cyclones might just end up at the top of the conference standings.

"I think the talent is better now (in the Big Eight) than it's ever been since I've been here," he said. "You've got to have a lot of good things happen to you; in other words, we're going to have to play pretty good."

Guard plays leaves questions at Missouri

Last Season's Record:
22-14/8-6 (tie 3rd in conference)
Collegian's Projected Finish: 5th
Projected All-Big Eight Performers:
Derrick Chievous (First Team)
Lynn Hardy (Honorable Mention)

By TONY CARBAJO

In spite of all the coaching changes around the Big Eight Conference in recent years, one man has remained steadfastly planted for two decades — Norm Stewart.

Stewart, the grizzled dean of Big Eight coaches, enters his 20th season at the helm of the Missouri Tigers. The volatile Stewart planted his roots in Columbia in 1967 and has remained a constant figure in a conference filled with turnovers. Some say Stewart may pick up roots at the end of the season and go elsewhere.

"I don't look at it that way," Stewart said at the Big Eight's Preseason Basketball Press Day. "I have been there 20 years. Next year, I will get an examination and hopefully it will be 21."

"Stormin' Norman" has been directing the Tigers so long that only two other Big Eight coaches have ever spent more time at one school — Kansas' Phog Allen (39 years) and Oklahoma State's Henry Iba (36 years).

Since taking over at Missouri, the 51-year-old Stewart has compiled a 19-year record of 357-196, been named the Big Eight Coach of the Year three times and harvested national Coach of the Year accolades in 1982. He has taken Missouri to its highest peak in school history on the hardwoods, when in a stretch from 1979-83, the team won 100 games and advanced to the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament four times.

That was, coincidently, the same four years that NCAA All-Americans and now National Basketball Association members Jon Sundvold and Steve Stipanovich reaked havoc around the conference, propelling the Tigers to four straight Big Eight titles. Since those days of Mizzou's myriad run of titles, Stewart has watched his Tigers fall to sixth-, third- and third-place finishes in the past three years.

To combat the influx of teams that have jumped ahead of Missouri in the past couple of seasons — namely Oklahoma, Kansas and Iowa State — Stewart has hit the recruiting trail in basketball talent-laden Detroit. He came away with enough players to snuggly fit into any of Motown's finest Cadillacs.

Talk around Columbia these days has Missouri sharing Detroit's "Motown" nickname and even being redubbed the "Detroit Tigers." Current Detroit natives on the roster include 6-foot-2 guard Lynn Hardy, 6-9 forward Nathin Buntin, 6-1 guard Lee Coward and John McIntyre (a transfer from University of Detroit who is sitting out the season). On the way, via the NCAA's early national letter of intent signing period, is 6-10 center-forward Doug Smith.

While Stewart will be counting on his Detroit connection, especially in the coming seasons, this year's team will rely heavily on the 6-7 shoulders of a gem plucked from Jamaica, N.Y., two years ago — preseason All-American candidate Derrick Chievous.

"Chievous is one of the best ball players in the country," Stewart said. "He is improving a lot of facets of his ball game. He is maturing, which I think is great because he can truly be one of the great players."

Chievous also grabbed the adulation of Oklahoma head coach Billy Tubbs, one who usually reserves all comment about the opposition because he is too busy praising his own troops.

"I judge people on what they do against us," Tubbs said. "I don't watch other games. I just see what they do to my team. Chievous flat out kills us. I think one time we had a good defensive effort and held him down to 29 (points)."

Chievous' highly potent offensive prowess, however, will need some help from a backcourt that lost the silky smooth jump shot of Jeff Strong to graduation. Hardy returns at point guard, but Missouri will be forced to start the season with 6-8 forward Mike Sandbothe at the off-guard position. It is this backcourt uncertainty that has made the Tigers a predicted preseason lower-division finisher in the conference race.

"We really have only three guards," Stewart said, "and sure, that's a concern. But I really think we have good mobility, which will

Kennedy to win MVP honor, lead Oklahoma to Big 8 title

The Big Eight Conference's Preseason Basketball Press Day was Sunday at the Kansas City International airport's Marriott Hotel.

Despite the change of four faces among the coaching ranks, the day was filled with the usual high hopes and colorful comments.

Probably the most colorful of those comments came from Iowa State Coach Johnny Orr. When asked which schools are going to be in the race for the conference title, he listed his top four — Iowa State, Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri — and then added that if K-State has Norris Coleman, the Wildcats will be right there with the others.

When asked if he was a gambling man and would he bet on Coleman playing or not playing, a smile crossed his face and he said, "Oh, I'll bet he plays."

And when asked about Coleman's impact upon K-State's outlook, he got really worked up. "When you have the Lord's sidekick come down and join your team...whoo, whoo, brother, that makes a difference," he said.

The mood was jovial, but the business at hand was the outlook for Big Eight basketball and the general consensus among both writers and coaches was that this season promises to be the conference's finest hour as far as basketball is concerned.

There was general agreement that, once again, the conference will land five teams in the 48-team National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament. Also in agreement was that the conference will gain national recognition as a league filled with tremendous basketball talents, and in the near future, the talent level of new recruits also will rise.

Throughout the week, a preview of each of the conference teams has been appearing on the sports page, along with the Collegian sports staff's projected finish for each team, as well as my projected All-Big Eight selections.

Now, it must be remembered that one intangible was used throughout the course of our writing and voting — all of the votes include Coleman playing for the Wildcats this season.

Here is the staff's projected order of finish:

First: Oklahoma. Led by returnees Darryl Kennedy, Tim McCalister and David Johnson and with the addition of junior college All-Americans Harvey Grant and Rickey Grace, the recipe for success in Soonerland might prove deadly for opponents, all the way to the Final Four.

Second: Iowa State. Johnny Orr is in the process of building a basketball powerhouse in Ames. Led by All-American candidate Jeff Grayer, some have ranked the Cyclones' balanced attack as high as seventh in the nation.

Third: Kansas. Picking KU this low might shock and offend some 'Hawk lovers, but after Danny Manning and Cedric Hunter, KU's lineup is filled with question marks. The final analysis by the staff is that you can't count upon freshmen, and the loss of Greg Dreiling in the middle will prove most devastating because Mark Pellock and Sean Alvarado just aren't going to cut it.

Fourth: K-State. With Coleman in the lineup, along with juco transfers Mitch Richmond, Charles Bledsoe and William Scott, the Wildcats might surprise many. The staff feels that if everything falls in place for first-year Coach Lon Kruger, the 'Cats just might scratch their way into the "Sweet 16" of the NCAA tourney.

Fifth: Missouri. When you have five great teams in a league, one great team has to finish fifth. That's Missouri's plight. The Tigers have all the talent to win the league, yes, win the league. Missouri's biggest worry is finding an off-guard to replace the graduated Jeff Strong. It's simply a matter of Norm Stewart finding himself with an improved team in a much-improved conference.

Sixth: Oklahoma State. First-year Coach Leonard Hamilton has brought nine new faces to Stillwater. It is hard to picture the Cowboys at this point, but Hamilton's 14 years of coaching at Kentucky have to help.

Bo Sox' Clemens claims AL award

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Roger Clemens, whose 24-4 record led the Boston Red Sox into the World Series, today was named the American League's Most Valuable Player, the first starting pitcher to the win the award in 15 years.

Clemens, who earlier won the AL Cy Young Award, gained his first MVP award over 1985 winner Don Mattingly of the New York Yankees and Boston teammate Jim Rice.

Clemens drew 339 points on 19 first-place votes, five second-place, two thirds and a fourth. Mattingly was second with 241 points, including five first-place votes, followed by Rice with the other four first-place votes and 241 points. They were the only players named on all 28 ballots.

The vote was conducted by the Baseball Writers' Association of America, and made Clemens the first starting pitcher to take the MVP since Vida Blue won the award for the Oakland A's in 1971.

Other pitchers who won the AL MVP award since 1971 were relievers Willie Hernandez of the Tigers in 1984 and Rollie Fingers of the Milwaukee Brewers in 1981, who also won the Cy Young.

Clemens, who was waiting for word at his home in Katy, Texas, said earlier, "I'm not anxious about it. I'm just very curious. Of course, if I won it, I'd be very elated."

Two members of the baseball writers from each American League city are eligible to vote for the MVP. Each writer lists 10 players with 14 points for each first-place vote, nine for second, eight for third, etc. The vote was taken prior to postseason play.

Mattingly, who would have been the first AL player to win successive MVP awards since former Yankee Roger Maris in 1960 and 1961, hit .352 with 238 hits, 31 homers and 113 RBI in 1986. Rice, the 1979 MVP and the last Boston player to win the award, hit .324 with 20 home runs and drove in 110 runs last season.

Other Red Sox players to win the MVP were Jimmy Foxx, 1938; Ted Williams, 1946 and 1949; Jackie Jensen, 1958; Carl Yastrzemski, 1967, and Fred Lynn, 1975.

Rice, contacted before the results of the balloting were announced, said, "I think Clemens is going to win it and I hope he does. I'd be glad for him, but I think the MVP should be given to a player who goes out there and performs well every day."

Voters certainly considered the 14 times Clemens won games in 1986 following a Boston loss, keeping the team from any potential losing strings.

Mizzou's VanZant reconsidering choice

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Tony VanZant, one of the most highly touted high school football players in the nation two years ago, hasn't decided if he'll enroll at the University of Missouri, where he signed a letter of intent.

On July 26, VanZant suffered a torn ligament in his left knee while playing in the Missouri Lions East-West Shrine all-star game. He has been recovering from arthroscopic surgery Aug. 11 and reconstructive surgery Aug. 23.

MU's play bewildering running back

The former Hazelwood Central star running back, who rushed for 6,000 yards and scored 91 touchdowns at the St. Louis County school, has yet to enroll as a freshman at MU.

"I don't know yet," VanZant told The Kansas City Times last week. "I'm not saying. I really can't tell what will happen."

His father, Thurman VanZant, said his son has asked him more than once whether he made the wrong choice.

"I don't think I'm going to play (in spring)," VanZant said. "I just want to get my leg together and wait for the fall. I'm just worried about the knee being strong."

Because VanZant has not enrolled, other schools can contact VanZant so long as they get permission from Missouri Athletic Director Jack Lengyel.

Fred Jacoby, Southwest Conference commissioner and the head of the Collegiate Commissioners Association said that since VanZant signed a letter of intent with Missouri, he would have to sit out two years of competition and have just two years of eligibility remaining.

"He's not going anywhere but Missouri. He wants to help turn things around. He might be coming in at the right time. You saw what Tony Dorsett did for Pitt, and that program was probably worse than this one," said Missouri Coach Woody Widenhofer.

If all the positives click, the Cowboys could help make conference history by being the sixth Big Eight team invited to the NCAA tourney.

Seventh: Nebraska. It's difficult not to feel just a little sorry for Danny Nee. He walked into a job at a football school that ran off a fairly successful coach one year before, and he has very little talent to work with. Nebraska is going to stun some people, but when all the games are done, they'll find themselves too close to the bottom for Nee's comfort.

Eighth: Colorado. The staff would have picked the Buffaloes for ninth, but that wasn't possible. Tom Miller has come to a job at Colorado that might prove more difficult than K-State football coach Stan Parrish's. To say the Buffs are lacking basketball talent would be an understatement.

All-Big Eight Performers:

First Team: Danny Manning (KU), Jeff Grayer (ISU), Norris Coleman (KSU), Darryl Kennedy (OU) and Derrick Chievous (MU).

Second Team: Cedric Hunter (KU), Matt Bullard (CU), Mitch Richmond (KSU), Harvey Grant and Tim McCalister (OU).

Honorable Mention: Brian Carr (NU), Todd Christian (OSU), Lynn Hardy (MU), Sam Hill and Gary Thompkins (ISU).

Big Eight Player of the Year: OU's Kennedy.

Big Eight Newcomer of the Year: K-State's Richmond.

Big Eight Coach of the Year: K-State's Kruger.

enable us to handle the pressure."

With a preseason schedule that includes Illinois, Memphis State and Virginia and a host of road games, Stewart's team will need to prepared to handle the pressure.

After 19 years in Columbia, it will take more than a guard shortcoming this season to unseat the savvy Stewart from his Big Eight dean's seat in the Hearnes Center.

KU nabs two recruits to bring total to four

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Forward Mike Maddox of Oklahoma City and center Mike Masucci of Grandview, Mo., have signed national letters of intent to attend the University of Kansas next year, basketball Coach Larry Brown announced Tuesday.

The signings brought to four the number of players who have agreed to play basketball for the Jayhawks starting with the 1987-88 season. Antoine Lewis, a 6-foot-1 guard from Brooklyn, and Ricky Butler, a 6-6 forward from Huntington Beach, Calif., announced last week that they would attend Kansas.

"Our recruiting year has been phenomenal," Brown said. "It just shows that our program is highly respected and can attract both quality players and quality people. I think it also demonstrates that our program is going in the right direction."

Maddox, who is 6-8 and 185 pounds, averaged 23.8 points and 10.8 rebounds last season for Oklahoma City's Putnam City North High School. The team qualified for the state playoffs and finished with a 22-4 record.

He is ranked the fifth-best high school forward in the nation in Van Coleman's national recruiting newsletter. He played with the Oklahoma Rams AAU team, being named its most valuable player last season and being picked as an AAU All-American three times.

His high school coach, Bill Robertson, says Maddox runs the floor and can shoot well, especially from the three-point range.

Masucci, 7-feet and 210 pounds, averaged 24 points and 11 rebounds for Grandview High School last season.

that's kind of heartbreaking," Bessert said. "(But) I strongly feel that (the program) is in an upward swing, something is going to happen in the future under Coach Parrish. He's a very positive person, and with positive people, positive things happen."

Moody, a fullback who will be forced to watch his last game from the sidelines because of a concussion, agreed.

"I think seeing Coach Parrish come in here and take over, getting everybody in the right attitude, I think they're going to have some good seasons to come," he said.

Hurd was a bit more philosophical in his reply.

"Every dog has its day, and it's about time for K-State," he said.

unenviable decision should Hanson go down in this week's contest against Colorado. Parrish said he is prepared to go with freshman Carl Straw as Hanson's backup, even though that would cost Straw, a redshirt, an entire year of eligibility.

"If the game is on the line, we have to play to win the football game," Parrish reasoned. "If the game isn't, we'll have a plan 'B.'"

Parrish said that plan would consist of inserting punter Troy Faunce in the quarterback slot, but only in what he called "a disaster situation."

Straw, No. 10 on the Wildcat roster, came to K-State from Fair Lawn High School, in Fair Lawn, N.J., where he received many honors for his play.

to pass legislation next year to restrain "disruptive takeovers."

She intends to introduce a proposal in the 100th Congress, which convenes in January, to deny tax advantages often used by corporate raiders in their financing plans, require fuller and more immediate disclosures by larger stock purchasers and revamp stockholder voting procedures to prevent speculators from swaying the outcome of buyouts.

"The attempted takeover of Goodyear is yet another example of how a company, which has focused on long-term growth rather than short-term profits, can be penalized for sound, strategic planning," Kassebaum said.

"Its long-term plans for growth must be pushed aside, and its management must deal with the more pressing issue of corporate survival. Employees, managers, retirees and cities dependent on its plants are now left bobbing in the wake of this Wall Street power play."

The hearing focused on the efforts of British-French financier Sir James Goldsmith, who has purchased 11 percent of Goodyear's stock and has said he hopes to acquire a controlling interest in the world's largest tiremaker.

Glickman said lawmakers and others reviewing takeovers must look at their impact on "all the corporation's constituents — on its employees and surrounding communities, not just on shareholders and management."

Although expressing uncertainty about the need for legislation to restrict hostile takeovers, Glickman complained that the Justice Department under Reagan leadership had a "complete disregard of antitrust prohibitions" because it generally considered takeovers as good.

"For my part, I don't believe it is yet clear whether hostile takeover activity is, on the whole, beneficial for our economy and our future competitiveness," said Glickman.

"But I am unequivocal in my dismay at the long-term competitive injury that may result from dismantling well-run, highly efficient and forward looking companies simply because of speculative maneuvers that serve to produce wealth."

Goodyear is fighting the takeover attempt with a program to restructure the company and drive up the cost of stock past the $49 a share Goldsmith has said he is willing to pay.

The restructuring plan includes the attempted sale of Goodyear's aerospace, wheel manufacturing and oil and gas subsidiaries as well as cost-cutting. The company has told its 130,000 employees to prepare for layoffs.

Gov. John Carlin, in a written statement to the subcommittee, expressed reservations of a possible "negative impact" on Topeka and the state if Goodyear is acquired by Goldsmith and his allies.

could be lessened with "more help from the Riley County Police Department."

Other traffic issues concerned passing on the right-hand side along Seth Child's Road.

Commissioner Gene Klingler said Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephen issued a ruling stating that passing on the right-hand side of the road was "not acceptable."

City Attorney Bill Frost said repainting of the white lines designating traffic lanes would probably remedy the conflict.

Although the Kansas Highway Patrol has been instructed to cite violators, Frost said the city "has no intention of prosecuting."

McCallum said the Kansas Department of Transportation has the authority to paint the lines. The resident engineer has been informed of the conflict over jurisdiction, which would decide who would paint the lines and who would retain the power of authority.

He said the city has no jurisdiction in the matter.

Budget

Hayden, who will make the decisions on the cuts, declined to provide any specifics on what cuts agencies will be expected to implement. Carlin described them as "significant" and "beyond belt-tightening."

However, the retiring governor said he doesn't think they will be as severe as the 4 percent across-the-board reductions he ordered in 1982 when the state faced an even more omnimous revenue depletion than now.

Letters will go out Wednesday from the Budget Division to agency heads telling them in specific amounts how much they are being asked to trim their budgets, then they will be allowed to appeal the cuts to Carlin who will meet again Nov. 26 with Hayden to relay their concerns to him.

Carlin said Hayden told him he would give agency heads the amounts they need to reduce spending and let them decide how to make the cuts.

While Carlin said he doesn't think Hayden has made his final decisions on specific amounts he will ask agencies to reduce their spending, the present governor said he can't imagine education escaping the knife.

That is because education constitutes about two-thirds of the state general fund budget of $1.3 billion.

"I can't imagine there is any way that education cannot be cut," Carlin said.

Hayden said he was awaiting calculations from the state Budget Division and his own transition team's fiscal experts before making his decisions on what cuts should be imposed on which agencies.

"We talked about the budget and the choices before us," Hayden told reporters.

"Staff is researching the numbers (on how much to cut from each agency) and nothing will be final until we see the staff numbers," Hayden added.

He said he would provide the numbers on the budget cuts to agency heads in the letters going out Wednesday, then give them a week "to look at the numbers and respond."

He said cabinet secretaries and other agency heads will have an opportunity to argue why the cuts are too deep and would damage programs.

Asked if the cuts would be severe in education, Hayden told newsmen they'd have to wait until Wednesday to find out.

Carlin said the decisions on the budget cuts are totally in Hayden's province. "He doesn't have to run those numbers by me," said Carlin, who said his entire role in the process will be to listen to agency heads' complaints, if any, about the cuts.

Carlin also said he would call a meeting of the State Finance Council very soon to seek approval for the issuance of another certificate of indebtedness so the state can borrow money from itself to ease cash flow problems until the budget cuts start reaping the savings.

The requests will be returned to the agencies for reworking in early December, Miller said. The budget will be submitted to Congress in late January or early February.

The budget director also said in his speech that he is likely to recommend to Reagan a "real" defense spending increase of 3 percent above the $289.7 billion appropriated by Congress for this year.

OMB spokesman Edwin Dale Jr. said this would translate to an actual increase of 6 percent once inflation was calculated into the formula, suggesting a defense spending request in the neighborhood of $308 billion.

This is still $10 billion below the spending increase reportedly being sought by Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger.

Meanwhile, another administration official, who spoke on condition that he not be identified, said a confidential OMB document suggests that cuts and savings totaling $54 billion will be needed to meet the $108 billion deficit target.

Hayden requests budget reductions

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

TOPEKA — Kansas agencies are being requested to chop 3.8 percent across the board from the budgets for the current fiscal year.

The cuts, which are expected to total $60 million, were announced by Governor-elect Mike Hayden in his Statehouse office Wednesday afternoon.

"It is necessary that I take this action to restore fiscal integrity to state government," Hayden said.

Hayden said he and Gov. John Carlin reviewed the action before the announcement.

"The Budget Division will monitor the proposed reductions in order to ensure that my intentions are carried out," Hayden said. "Agency heads who do not comply with the general objectives of the plan will be asked do return to the drawing board."

Hayden, who said agency heads will have until Dec. 3 to submit proposals, emphasized that the budget reductions should not adversely affect essential services. He said the Kansas Legislature probably will take formal action on the reduced budget during the first two days of the next session.

The Republican governor-elect said the $60 million figure was obtained by adding a projected $30 million deficit in state revenues and an additional $30 million for year-end surplus.

Hayden said the $30 million surplus was the minimum amount aceptable, but is "probably not adequate."

During the news conference, Hayden said smaller agencies supported by general funds will be affected the most due to their lack of flexibility in staff and budget numbers.

Hayden said the Kansas Department of Education probably will experience reductions of about $24 million, with the Board of Regents expecting cuts between $12 million and $13 million.

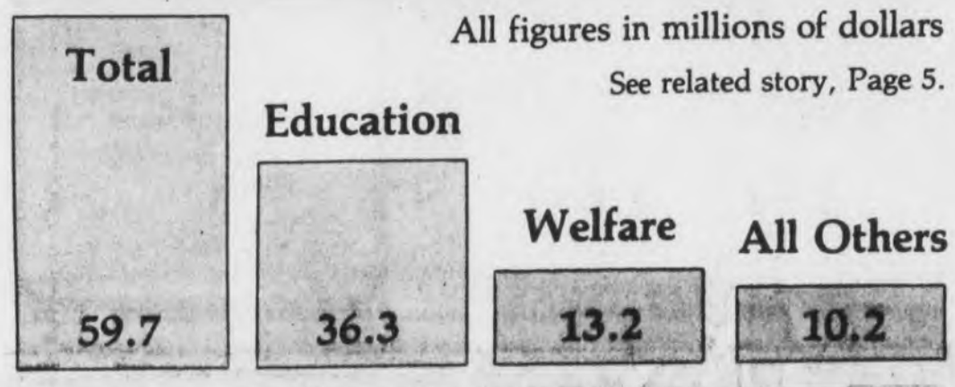
He said, using the Regents as an example, that those cuts would come systemwide and not necessarily from the institutions. The larger total for the education department, Hayden said, results from that agency's large share of the state's budget.

Hayden also said that Capital Improvement Programs would not be exempt from the cuts.

Hayden said that by allowing the agencies themselves to present reductions, "they tell us how they best feel it can be dealt with."

Hiring freezes had been considered, Hayden said, but added that such actions would probably be best left to the individual agency heads.

The governor's office, he said, will undergo a cut of 5 percent, met largely by not filling all employment positions authorized by the Legislature.



On the subject of possible monetary windfalls made possible by changes in the federal tax code, Hayden said they would have "really

Budget cut may reduce K-State's present funds in excess of $3 million

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

State budget cuts may force a reduction in excess of $3 million in University fiscal resources for 1986-87, George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said Wednesday.

"The specifics on the reduction are yet to be disseminated by the governor's office. It's simply an announcement that we're looking at a 3.8-percent reduction in the general budget for the 1986-87 fiscal year," Miller said.

The University receives its operating resources from tuition money and state-provided general revenue.

In a statement Wednesday, Governor-elect Mike Hayden announced a $12 million to $13 million reduction in the Board of Regents' budget. This cut spans the entire Regents' system, including K-State, five other state universities and the Kansas Technical Institute in Salina.

However, Hayden said the cuts may affect office personnel, office equipment or anything the Regents use to operate.

The Regents have until Dec. 3 to submit a budget plan for fiscal 1987 to the state budget director. Their plan must then be approved by a number of governmental officials.

University President Jon Wefald, anticipating the possibility of state reductions, wrote a letter to the University provost, vice presidents, deans, directors and department heads Monday to alert them of the possible cuts.

In the letter, Wefald suggested they "...start now to consider alternatives available to your respective units. I would suggest that your alternatives focus on a 2.5-percent reduction of your general use

Reagan takes responsibility for arms sale

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said Wednesday night the controversial decision to sell arms to Iran was "mine and mine alone," and said two other American hostages in Lebanon would have been freed "if there had not been so much publicity" about the shipments.

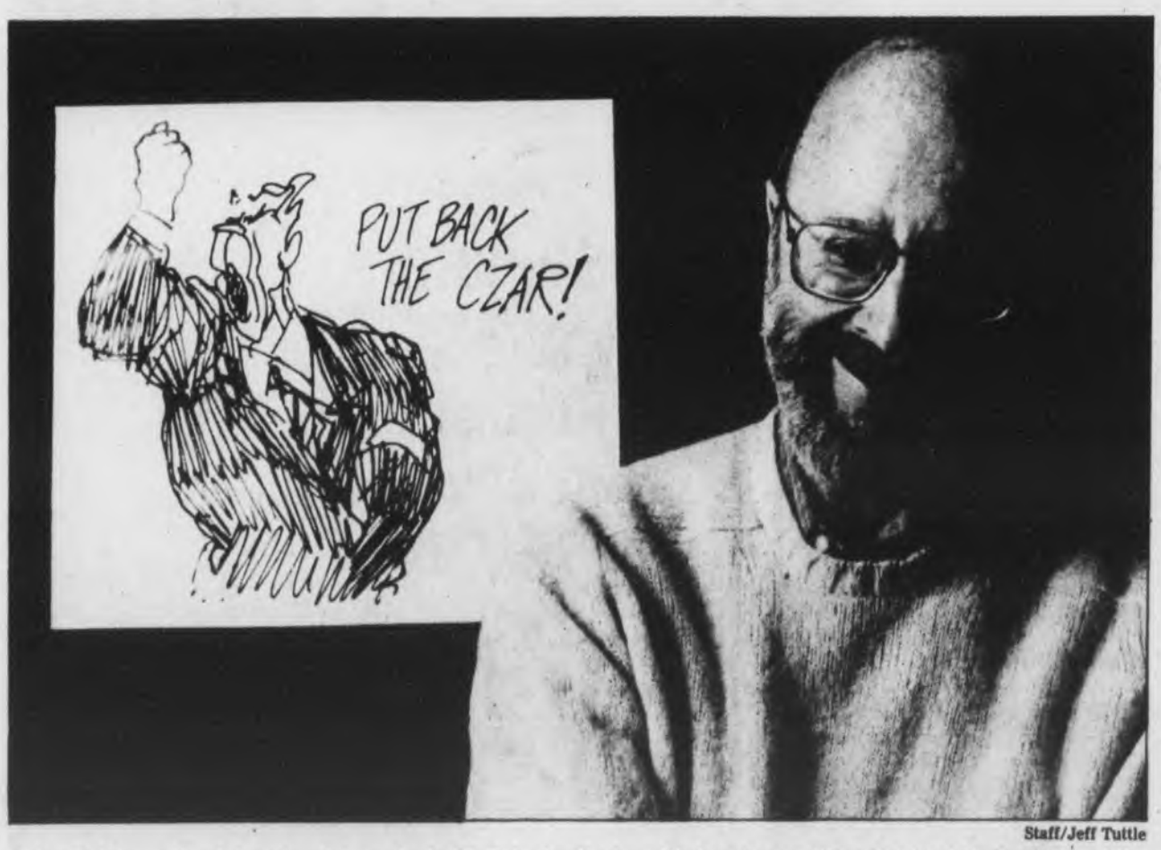
At his first news conference in nearly three months, Reagan said that despite reported opposition to the arms sale, Secretary of State George Shultz would remain in his Cabinet post.

"He has made it plain he would stay as long as I want him, and I want him," the president said.

Reagan promised to provide key members of Congress with all information about the past arms shipments. But he said there may continue to be information he cannot divulge in public, and declined to answer a question about reported Israeli participation in the arms shipments.

Reagan opened the nationally televised meeting with reporters with an opening statement that confronted the Iranian arms issue head-on.

He conceded that the shipments amounted to a waiver of his policy of retaining an arms embargo against Iran, but said the exception was justified by the potential rewards.



He quoted Abraham Lincoln as saying that if an action proved correct, all the criticism didn't matter. If it were wrong, "10 angels swearing I was right won't make it right."

Defending his arms deal, Reagan said, "I was not breaking any law" in authorizing the arms sale or ordering top aides not to provide Congress with immediate information.

Three American hostages were released in Beirut at times that coincided with the arms shipments, but Reagan, as he did in a televised speech last week, denied that he was trading arms for hostages.

"I don't see where the kidnappers or hostage holders gained anything. They let the hostages go...As a matter of fact, if there had not been so much publicity, we would Jules Feiffer, editorial cartoonist, spoke in McCain Auditorium Wednesday on "The Political Cartoonist and the Media." It was the third convocation lecture in a series this semester.

Cartoonist slams Ronald Reagan, pokes fun at press during address

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

Unlike previous presidential administrations, President Reagan is loved by the "Teflon electorate" even though he lies to them, said Jules Feiffer, noted editorial cartoonist and satirical writer.

"We love Ronald Reagan, in part, because of the ways he lies to us," he said. "(Reagan) tells the truth when he lies."

Speaking with as much wit and satire as he puts in his editorial-page cartoons, Feiffer discussed his dealings with presidential administrations, political ideas, civil rights and the American society.

Feiffer's speech, "The Political Cartoonist and the Media," was the third convocation lecture in a series in McCain Auditorium this semester. About 150 people attended the lecture — his first lecture at a university since the '70s — Wednesday morning.

During the lecture, Feiffer also gave a slide presentation reviewing some of his cartoons, many of which were directed at Reagan.

In lieu of the president's public support, Feiffer said, "He is not a man, but a photo opportunity."

With the arms deal made with Iran, Feiffer said the "reawakened press" has started treating Reagan comparably to former president Jimmy Carter after not tarnishing his Teflon image in the first six years of his presidency.

"The press has laid down to the president for six years," he said. "They have done little to bloody his nose."

He said he does not know if the press will start remembering its news function as it did in earlier administrations.

"That's the unknown equation," he said.

Feiffer said many quality cartoonists have retained a liberal bias despite the progressive movement to the right in today's news-opinion pages.

"Cartoonists want to communicate a certain bias," he said.

Political cartoons depicting Reagan have been easy to do because of the off-the-wall statements the president makes on national defense, international relations and civil rights, Feiffer said.

"Reality is altered every time he speaks to the press," he said.

Political cartooning is the best it has been in many years because of Reagan's blunders, he said.

"(Drawing a cartoon on) Reagan is like shooting ducks in a barrel," Feiffer said.

He also said the influx of information that the press delivers has dramatically increased, but at the same time there has been less knowledge gained by the consumer.

"(The increase in news) has made a disaster out of our ability to retain information," he said. "There is no such thing as memory."

Kodak to withdraw from S. Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Eastman Kodak, citing a weak economy made worse by apartheid, said Wednesday it will withdrw from South Africa and prohibit its subsidiaries from supplying products to this country.

The photographic equipment manufacturer is the seventh American company to announce recently that it is leaving South Africa and the first of them to halt sales of its products.

Kodak employs 466 people at five sales and service facilities in South Africa. Ian Guthrie, director of employee information at the company headquarters in Rochester, N.Y., said 130 are black, 130 of mixed race, about 20 Asian and the rest white.

Colby Chandler, chairman and chief executive officer, said in a statement: "Our South African business has been affected negatively by weakness in the South African economy. We also have no dobt that the system of apartheid has played a major role in the economy's under-performance."

His statement promised employees "a generous separation package" and re-employment counseling.

Atex Inc., a Kodak computer-making subsidiary based in Massachusetts, also announced it will pull out, according to a Johannesburg spokesman quoted by the South African Press Associastion.

Three major South African newspaper chains use Atex computer systems: the Argus Group, South African Associated Newspapers, and Nasionale Pers.

Neither the Kodak statement nor company spokesman Henry Kaska in Rochester would explain why the sale of Kodak products will be banned after April 30, 1987.

Convictions break up Mafia board

NEW YORK — Eight people, including three Mafia bosses, were convicted Wednesday of participating in a "commission" that has split territories, sanctioned rubouts and kept organized crime organized since the days of Prohibition.

With the verdict, the FBI said, all the mob's policy makers were either in the grave or on their way to jail. The case also proved for the first time the existence of a panel that oversees national operations of the Mafia.

"It can no longer be passed off as a prosecutor's theory. It's been proven beyond a reasonable doubt there is a Mafia; La Cosa Nostra exists," said U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani.

Cutting back doesn't help smokers

BOSTON — Smokers who cut back tend to compensate by smoking more intensely, tripling the tar and nicotine they inhale from each cigarette and undercutting their efforts to improve their health, a study has found.

"Our advice is that if they can, the best thing to do is quit entirely," said Dr. Peyton Jacob III, a co-author of the study. "The next best thing is to cut down the number of cigarettes and if they could, switch to an ultra-low yield brand."

In addition, he said, they should concentrate on avoiding puffing more deeply, more often or smoking each cigarette down to the butt.

The study suggests that by smoking more intensely, people are able to satisfy their nicotine craving with far fewer cigarettes than they ordinarily smoke. This explains why people trying to stop smoking often are able to cut back but fail to kick the habit.

Kansas homes contain radon gas

TOPEKA — As many as 8,000 Kansas homes may have high enough levels of cancer causing radon gas to warrant instituting costly countermeasures, a state air quality specialist told a legislative subcommittee Wednesday.

Moreover, as many as 80,000 homes — 10 percent of all Kansas residences — may have radon levels higher than the federal Environmental Protection Agency has judged to be acceptable, said David J. Romano, manager of the Kansas Department of Health and Environment's air quality and radiation control bureau.

Romano made the statement to the Radon Subcommittee of the Special Committee on Energy and Natural Resources as he outlined steps federal and state officials are taking to test levels of radon in Kansas homes.

As many as 2,700 homes could be tested for presence of the naturally occurring radioactive gas during an EPA study that is scheduled to begin Dec. 1 and the state may follow up by testing about 5,000 additional homes possibly next year, Romano said.

Although the EPA has designated the eastern one-fifth of Kansas as an area that may have "the greatest chance of producing high levels of radon," Romano said initial testing by private groups indicates a far larger portion of the state may be plagued by unacceptably high radon levels.

Group approves state census in '88

TOPEKA — Turning aside Democrats' objections over the cost, a legislative study committee today voted to introduce legislation in the 1987 session which would create a one-time state census in 1988 to be used to reapportion the Kansas House in 1989.

Led by Senate Minority Leader Michael Johnston, D-Parsons, and Reps. Bill Rearson, D-Kansas City, and Gary Blumenthal, D-Merriam, the Democrats argued the state should not commit itself to spending several million dollars for a state census in 1988 when it can get federal census figures free after the 1990 U.S. census.

However, majority Republicans argued the Legislature should obey the Kansas Constitution, which mandates the House reapportion itself for the 1990 elections, noting the federal figures won't be available in time to draw new House districts for those elections.

Approved on voice votes by the Legislature's Special Committee on Legislative Apportionment were:

— A proposed resolution which would submit to voters at the 1988 general election a change in the state constitution allowing the Legislature to reapportion both House and Senate districts during the 1989 session based on a 1988 state census, but not mandating it. The proposed amendment also would require the Legislature to reapportion itself in 1992, based on 1990 federal census figures, and every 10 years after that.

Lobbyists reduce October spending

TOPEKA — Lobbyist spending in October dropped to the lowest level in two years as interest groups shelled out $3,592 to win favors with state lawmakers, according to a report the Kansas Public Disclosure Commission received Wednesday.

However, that amount pushed the total lobbyists have spent this year to a record $458,618, compared to the previous annual record of $446,894 set in 1985 and last year's 10-month total of $420,776.

The October spending was the lowest since October 1984, when lobbyists paid only $2,907 to influence lawmakers. The lobbyists' biggest month for spending during the last two years came in February, when they forked over $151,269.

Statistician doubts sample size

Proposed task force survey raises questions

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

A survey of 100 students is not enough to accurately measure student opinion about the proposed athletic fee, said Lou Cairoli, graduate student in statistics.

"Clearly, the more people you include in your survey, the better that survey is going to be because (of) the more information you will gather about the population you're trying to estimate," Cairoli said.

The more students surveyed, the lower the standard error will be, he said.

In addition to surveying more students, an athletic fee survey needs to stratify the different grade levels of students, he said, because incoming students will be affected differently than outgoing students.

"The survey should choose a random sample from each of those academic classes," he said.

Because there are different numbers of students in each level, Cairoli said the number surveyed should be based on those proportions.

"If there are 30 percent freshmen at the University, you would want to have 30 percent of your sample to be freshmen," he said. "That would be representative of what's going on in the population."

Some factors determining the extent of a survey are cost and time. Surveying a large number of students takes a lot of both, he said.

However, there is a point at which including more students in the survey does not increase the information that you get, he said.

A survey of 400 to 500 students would be reasonable, Cairoli said.

"A response rate of 60 (percent) to 70 percent is what you want to shoot for. The problem with using a survey of 100 students is that you'll probably end up with about 50 or 60," he said.

The suggestion of holding a student referendum during Student Senate elections in February is not a good one, Cairoli said.

"I don't like that at all," he said, "because the voter turnout in those elections is extremely low."

Only those who are "highly motivated" will participate in that sort of an election, he said. "They're going to be deciding what's going on for 14,000 or 15,000 students."

Cairoli said that if he were Athletic Director Larry Travis, he would want the issue resolved during Senate elections.

"The reason is because I could go ahead and motivate my supporters to go out there and vote," he said. "And it's more likely that he'll be able to have his way.

"I don't know if it's fair or not. I would have serious reservations about deciding the issue in this way."

Cairoli said he believed if the majority of K-State students voted on the issue, it would not pass.

A poll taken during registration would give "a very accurate reading" of students' opinions, he said.

"What's wrong with having some sort of vote or poll during registration?" he asked. "Everybody has to go through the registration line."

The results could either be used as a vote or as a poll, he said.

Charles D. Kincaid, graduate student in statistics, said he thought registration time would be too soon for a student vote.

"This is an issue that hits each student in the pocket book," he said. "Students are not informed enough on the issue yet."

Kincaid suggested that task force members visit living groups and hold seminars to inform students about the proposed athletic fee.

Travis' statement that a correlation exists between winning and an athletic fee is incorrect, Kincaid said.

"All statisticians say that correlation is not causation," he said. "So you really can't say that a non-revenue athletic fee is going to cause a winning team."

Statistics can be used in any way, he said, and people can make statistics say what they want them to say.

"Consulting with the statistics department, even on an informal basis, would help the credibility of any survey," he said.

Nicaraguan leader denounces U.S. aid

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The Contra rebels trying to overthrow Nicaragua's leftist government will not succeed — no matter how much money or support they are given by the United States, Nicaraguan Vice President Sergio Ramirez said Wednesday night.

"The mercerary forces that the government of the United States directs will not be able to win," Ramirez told 800 students and faculty members who packed an auditorium at the University of Kansas.

"They will not be able to achieve victory even if they were given 100, 200 or 300 million dollars because they are clearly identified with the murderers and torturers of the past (regimes)," he said.

About a dozen students passed out flyers, which supported and denounced the Contras, and a couple of students carried a sign that protested U.S. aid to the Contras. Others handed out yellow balloons printed with the words: "Let Nicaragua Live" and "No Contra Aid."

Ramirez, who studied English at KU for 10 weeks during the late 1960s, said sovereignty was essential to an effective democratic system and that every country should have unrestricted ability to manage its own affairs.

"The government of the United States, in the greatest conspiracy against democracy in the history of hemispheric relations, is trying to restore to power in Nicaragua those, who for half a century, destroyed by brute force any vestige of democracy."

At a press conference earlier in the day, the Nicaraguan leader said Eugene Hasenfus, the American mercenary sentenced to up to 30 years in a Nicaraguan prison, is a "victim" who could be pardoned by the government.

Hasenfus, of Marinette, Wis., was captured last month when the plane on which he was a cargo handler was shot down. He said the plane was carrying weapons to the Contras.

On Saturday he was sentenced to up to 30 years in prison by a tribunal that convicted him of terrorism and crimes against the state.

"Mr. Hasenfus is a victim," Ramirez said. "He was involved in illegal activities against my country."

Ramirez said the case is being reviewed by an appeals court.

"We have stated we are prepared to deal with this case in political terms," he said. "And we don't dismiss the possibility that my government could give a pardon to Mr. Hasenfus."

A pardon, he said, would have to be approved by the National Assembly following a request by President Daniel Ortega.

Ramirez said the war with U.S.-backed Contras is the No. 1 problem facing his nation.

"We are the victims of erroneous aggression," he said. "The war sponsored by the United States has cost 20,000 lives. We have many problems relating to the war."

Ramirez said comments from U.S. government officials that Nicaragua and Cuba want to wage war throughout South America and eventually invade the United States is not true.

"We are a small country," he said. "We are a very poor country. We do not wish to wage war with anybody. We do not have the military machinery to do so."

"We are sure the people of the United States do not support aggressive actions against Nicaragua, as all recent polls show," Ramirez said.

Acquisition of center to benefit University

Great things will be in store for K-State and Manhattan when the Ramada Inn officially becomes the University Inn Dec. 1.

Ownership of the hotel/convention center at 17th Street and Anderson Avenue will be assumed by Kansas State Partners Inc., a division of the Marriott Corp. The division exists primarily to manage businesses for corporations and universities.

A number of benefits will be derived from the change in ownership. The primary one will be for the hotel and restaurant management instructional program, pending approval of the program's expansion by the Kansas Board of Regents. The board should approve the expansion.

Students would be able to work in a realistic, professional environment. Furthermore, they would gain invaluable experience by working for a corporation. Such an expansion would aid in the enrollment increase already expected in the program.

Another substantial benefit will be economic. The enhanced capability of the hotel to handle conferences and the expansion of the hotel and restaurant management program should, as one University official predicted, give the regional and the state economy a significant boost.

In addition, there is the possibility of adding on to the building, which would inject even more dollars into the local economy.

The signing of a 50-year contract between the KSU Foundation and Kansas State Partners Inc. will not only provide stability, but also will be of economic benefit to the Foundation.

University officials should be praised for their foresight.

Corporation's policy shows archaic sexism

As times have changed, most people would agree that sexism is wrong and the equality of the sexes is right. However, Ortho Pharmaceutical Inc. is taking a step in the wrong direction.

In a Kansas City Times article Monday, it was reported that Mary Jane Adkins, a sales representive for Ortho in Washington, D.C., claimed that Ortho fired her because she was pregnant. Her case is quite strong. Management training literature exhibits the same opinion toward pregnant women that she claims caused her to be fired. An Ortho training manual prepared by an outside consultant stated, "A married mother is not statistically likely to survive" at Ortho.

There are a number of other sexist comments made throughout the literature such as "Women have more social problems that create business problems..." Ortho training literature states that women must be screened for the following during job interviews: excessive daily time allotted for hair, nails, make-up; demanding husband; wealthy background; and expensive jewelry and accessories. The literature also warns to avoid "a woman who likes or is interested in, or has owned an expensive, less practical car (Corvette, Porsche)."

The worst part is that it fuels dated double standards between the sexes that should be out of style. For a male to own an expensive but "less practical car" is considered a desirable trait. For men, people see the car as a status symbol, that they are going somewhere in life. Why should it be different for women? Advances made in equality must not meet setbacks such as this.

U.S. punishment doesn't fit crime

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

When discussing an issue that is clouded with prejudices, the first step is to destroy those prejudices, to undermine the indoctrination to which people have been exposed, to philosophize with a hammer and smash the erroneous assumptions commonly held as self-evident truths. Such is the case with the misconceptions and myths about violent crime in this country.

The first assumption we need to examine is put forward by the so-called "realist" criminologists who presumably look at the "realities of human nature." According to this school, violent crime is a result of mankind's inherently evil nature. By comparing the incidence of violent crime in this country to those of other industrialized nations (and thereby avoid the murky concept of "evil,") one finds that "evil" is not the sole cause of crime, if it is one at all.

In the late 1970s, 10 Americans died from criminal violence per capita for every one Japanese, Austrian, West German or Swede; 15 Americans for every Swiss or Englishman; and 20 Americans for every Dane. The crime rate, which has dropped in this country and risen in some other Western nations, is of little use because the United States still leads other nations significantly in the incidence of violent crime per capita.

The crime rates in Japan and Switzerland have declined in recent years while the Norwegian and Danish murder rates have remained fairly constant for 40 years. If man is inherently evil, as the self-proclaimed "realist" criminologist would argue, then why is he considerably more evil here than in other Western countries? I submit that he is not, and that we should look at societal influences, rather than accepting defeatist attitudes about innate sin.

Another common myth about violent crime comes in a pair of erroneous assumptions. The first is a product of the "economic model" of crime espoused mainly by political conservatives and pro-death penalty hardliners. According to this school, someone commits a crime when he perceives the benefits as outweighing the costs.

Added to this is the assumption that by increasing the costs of crime, society can ultimately deter it. (Interestingly, members of this school have always focused on increasing the costs of crime but never the benefits of lawful behavior.) Stated bluntly, there is no factual evidence to support these assumptions, as this country's penal system is one of the strictest among Western nations.

In the early 1980s, the incarceration rate in the Netherlands, which was 21 people for every 100,000, was the lowest of any industrialized nation. In Japan it was 44 per 100,000. Norway, Sweden, West Germany, Denmark and France followed with 45, 55, 60, 63 and 67 people per 100,000, respectively. Britain was slightly higher with 80 incarcerated people per 100,000. In the United States, the incarceration rate was 217 people per 100,000.

But this doesn't tell the whole story. An early 1970s study conducted at Yale University found convicted criminals in this country face far greater chances of imprisonment than do convicted criminals in Japan or Britain. This study is not completely indicative of the situation, however, because it took place before the prison "boom" of the mid-1970s when the already high incarceration rate in the United States doubled.

This study also took place before the penal systems of this country, at the urging of conservatives, began to lengthen sentences for prisoners. Meanwhile, many European nations were reducing sentences. In the Netherlands, the average sentence for armed robbery went from 32 months in 1950 to 19 months in 1981. Currently, the average sentence for armed robbery in the United States is 68 months in state penitentiaries and 150 in federal penitentiaries.

What about actual time served? In the United States, the average time served is 16 months. In Britain, it is five months, and in the Netherlands it is a mere 1.3 months. In short, this country has the highest incidence of crime of industrialized nations even though it locks up people at a greater rate than any other so-called "advanced" society, (except South Africa and the Soviet Union, which are not fair comparisons considering their high number of political prisoners).

Yet, in a country where the penal system is one of the strictest of the industrialized world, society continues to blame leniency for crime. The recent gubernatorial race might serve as a good example. While "Hanging Mike Hayden" promised to reinstate the death penalty as well as lengthen sentences, his opponent, Tom Docking, the so-called "ultra-liberal," was promising to "lock the revolving doors on our prisons" and "get tough on crime."

To argue that we have a stricter penal code because we have more crime is at best a circular argument, because it fails to explain why we have so much crime to begin with. Some cite the need for greater restrictions on social deviance but they fail to explain why the Scandinavian countries, which have very liberal laws concerning sex, pornography and drugs, are strikingly low in crime when compared to the United States.

While espousing the values of discipline at home and in the school, some ignore that corporal punishment is illegal in Sweden and widely scorned by citizens of other Western nations. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, affirmed parents' "right" to beat their children in 1977. This is the only Western nation that executes its citizens, yet the people clamor for more authoritarian controls.

When Americans become as fed-up with faulty assumptions and unfounded myths as they are with crime, perhaps they will begin to look for the real causes of crime. Until then, one of the strictest penal systems in Western society will continue to punish the very citizens it purports to protect.

Closing Aggieville

Editor,

Re: The editorial, "Law enforcement key to stemming violence," in Tuesday's Collegian.

On the surface, a proposal to close Aggieville businesses on the day of the KU-K-State game seems extreme. The Collegian expressed that this solution is unrealistic and detailed what "a truly workable and solvable plan" would include. It is when we examine these types of plans that it becomes apparent nothing short of closing Aggieville will address this problem.

The first "essential point" in this plan stressed "no-nonsense law enforcement." Why has "no-nonsense" enforcement waned in the past? Because 4,000 to 6,000 people are cramming into a two-block area under the influence of alcohol. This is the "nonsense" that should be removed. In regard to students taking responsibility, how can we be responsible for those individuals who have no affiliation with this University or any other? The third point, banning glass containers, would not reduce injuries or violence because as we saw this year, full cans of beer can easily be used as projectiles in their place. Finally, moving the game to mid-November cannot be sensibly suggested as a solution. Are we to assume if there happens to be a 40-percent chance of cold weather then we only have a 40-percent chance of preventing another disturbance? I hope not.

In relation to the assertion, it is unrealistic to expect Aggieville merchants to forego the revenue of that day. I believe they should realize another disturbance will affect them directly in the long term. These types of disturbances can only harm long-term recruitment. The merchants should be reminded increased enrollment is to their benefit and they should not be a party to any event that will frustrate these goals.

It is important to remember that after the first disturbance, several groups, including the mayor's ad hoc committee, looked into ways to prevent this last disturbance. An earnest effort was attempted, through such proposals as mentioned above, and yet, the results were unsuccessful. We cannot allow the reputation of this institution to be laid on the line again.

This "truly workable and solvable plan," gives no more assurance than past proposals that another disturbance will not occur next year. I believe we should not allow next year's game to be another experiment. The only proposal that offers a viable solution is to close Aggieville. Is potential national embarrassment and its consequences worth the profit of one evening for a few individuals?

Other Aggie solutions

Editor,

A bill has been brought up by the Student Senate to shut down Aggieville on the night of the KU-K-State game. The question is, is this the best solution? Well, certainly this would stop the law breaking in Aggieville such as destroying property and public consumption of alcohol, but would it stop in other areas of Manhattan? This solution is a feasible solution, but it will only spread the celebrating throughout Manhattan.

There are other solutions besides this. One might be to keep Aggieville open and have the entrance blocked by the Riley County Police Department and the Fort Riley Military Police Department. Have only one entrance to Aggieville, and at this entrance, check for open containers. Drinking is not allowed on Aggieville streets any other time. Why should a football game make any difference? Another possible solution is to have some sort of street dance away from Aggieville. The purpose behind this is to separate the majority of the crowd from going to Aggieville.

There are still more solutions to this problem than just the two I have suggested. The problem that remains is finding a solution that works effectively is going to be difficult.

Farrell inconvenient

Editor,

Farrell Library is not meeting the K-State students' needs. There needs to be longer hours to meet our needs. I am tired of having to find another study place when 11 p.m. rolls around. Also, these early closing hours do not permit late-night research when most students have time to study.

I realize that there are extra costs associated with keeping the library open later hours, but Farrell should be accessible to the students at K-State. Since the students supply the money to run the library, I think we are entitled to have it available when we need it. Maybe by keeping the library open a little longer at night, we can keep up with other Big Eight libraries. We all know Farrell Library ranks eighth in the Big Eight. This might be a step up for the University.

In support of UPC

Editor,

Re: The editorial, "UPC should evaluate campus needs, wants," in Tuesday's Collegian.

We do evaluate campus needs and wants by having a variety of committees staffed by student volunteers. These volunteers come from a wide range of the students and act as representatives for the students. We take suggestions from friends, fellow students, faculty and staff, and then pass along this information in the form of programming ideas. Some of these ideas fail, but many more are successful.

The leadership of UPC has just returned from a four-day conference where we met with representatives from more than 50 schools from Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado and Missouri. At the conference, we shared problems that we have encountered and the successful things we have done. We learned that we are not the only ones having problems, but that other activities programs also are having difficulties, many of which are similar to ours. We also discussed new ways to approach activities programming and returned with many great ideas. We are in the process of reviewing our programming methods so to continue to bring new and quality programs to the campus.

In direct response to your comments concerning the Starship concert, we have access to Ahearn Field House two weekends during the bulk of the school year. These are Homecoming and Parents Day. Options are minimal when you only have two dates available. Starship was the best option and, we felt, a quality choice. At this time, low ticket sales for concerts are a characteristic in the Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri area. Case in point, the Veterans Day Benefit Concert was moved from Allen Field House at the University of Kansas to a smaller facility in the Kansas City metro area, and still, ticket sales were low. Addressing your comments on the film committee, many schools' film programs are having trouble. One example is the dropping of the spring film program by the programming board at Wichita State University.

In examining overall budgets, K-State's is considerably smaller than other schools in the Big Eight. Examples: University of Missouri's budget for the 1985-86 school year was $159,000; the University of Nebraska, $124,000; and Oklahoma State University, $33,000. Even Emporia State, with an enrollment of 5,000, programmed on a budget of $28,000. Most of these schools are either funded directly from or subsidized by a student activities fee. K-State, which programs on a budget of $18,000 a year, is not supported by a student activities fee, but is allocated funding by the Union.

We at UPC work with what we have in terms of budget, facilities, scheduling, etc. We are always open to suggestions from the students and encourage them to submit them to UPC, located in the Activities Center on third floor of the Union.

Reductions target education, welfare

Agencies to take 83 percent of cuts

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Education and welfare agencies will shoulder $49.5 million, or nearly 83 percent, of the total $59.7 million in budget cuts mandated Wednesday by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden to avert a projected $13 million state budget deficit on June 30.

Elementary and higher education officials must whack $36.3 million from their Fiscal Year 1987 budgets, while the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services will be forced to slash its spending $13.2 million.

Gary Stotts, acting director of the budget, said the $59.7 million is 3.8 percent of the $1.57 billion state general fund spending, minus $226 million in capital improvements and demand transfers which are authorized by law and cannot be cut.

"We're looking at a large amount of money," Stotts said. "The seriousness of it to individual agencies depends on the flexibility the agency heads have in their specific budgets.

"Of course, employee salaries and wages normally are the largest single operating expense in any budget. If the agencies take the cuts in their administrative costs, they are looking at salary and wage reductions."

Stotts said he believes most agency directors can make the necessary 3.8 percent reductions without massive layoffs of state employees. However, he said some agencies likely will consider reducing their staff size in order to protect vital services.

"I would anticipate there will be some positions already authorized that will not be filled because of this and some agencies will look at reductions in current positions. But I certainly wouldn't want to speculate about any employees losing their jobs."

Reducing employee salaries is not being considered at this point, Stotts said, although the regents and court systems — which control their own pay plans — might take that route.

According to Stott's calculations, the Department of Education, which governs the state's 304 local school districts and 19 community colleges, must take $24.2 million from its $636.8 million general fund appropriation.

The state Board of Regents, responsible for setting budgets and policy for the six state-funded universities and the Kansas Technical Institute in Salina, must slice $12.1 million from its $322.6 million appropriation — minus $4.1 million protected from the cuts.

The welfare agency must chop $13.2 million from its appropriation of $347.9 million. Most of the SRS budget is devoted to indigent services, such as welfare payments for poor, unemployed and disabled Kansans, meaning a higher concentration of the cuts will be made on the administrative level.

Other agencies which face significant cuts from Hayden's budget cleaver are the Department of Corrections, the Department of Revenue and the judicial branch of government.

The prisons agency must carve $2.2 million from its $66.1 million appropriations. However, $7.3 million of the total is protected under the capital improvement program underway to expand prison bed space.

The corrections department is under considerable stress from an overcrowding problem which has pushed the state inmate population to 5,105, beyond the maximum bed space of 4,700.

The revenue agency, responsible for collecting state taxes and monitoring income and expenditures, must chop $1.2 million from its $155.9 million appropriation, although $122.7 million is protected. That amount includes payments due local school districts for their income tax rebate.

University teacher dies following brief illness

By The Collegian Staff

William Allen Ramoska, 37, an associate professor of entomology, died Nov. 11 after a brief illness.

Ramoska came to K-State in 1977 as an assistant professor in entomology. He was promoted to associate professor in 1982.

He was born on Janurary 24, 1949, in Akron, Ohio. He received his bachelor's, master's and doctoral degrees at Ohio State University. Ramoka married Audrey J. Dawson on June 19, 1971 in Columbus, Ohio.

In addition to being an active member of the Manhattan Optimist Club and a member of the Optimist Club board of directors, he was a member of the Entomological Society of America.

Ramoska recently returned from a sabbatical at Boyce Thompson Institute in New York. At the institute, he studied the pathology of grasshoppers and chinch bugs, specifically the fungal pathogens. This was related to his studies at K-State.

"He was very active in the College of Agriculture undergraduate program," said Robert Helgesen, head of the Department of Entomology. "He chaired the committee for several years and was involved with the restructuring of the program."

Ramoska is survived by his wife, Audrey J. Dawson-Ramoska; two daughters, Cassandra and Molly; his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Algerd Ramoska of Copely, Ohio; and a sister, Sharon Wilson of Barberton, Ohio.

"He was a very congenial person," Helgesen said. "He was very outgoing and a receptive type of person — easy to get along with and easy to know."

Funeral services were held Friday at the First United Methodist Church.

Regents review revised mission reports

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

Presentation of the formal mission statements for each of the Regents institutions is scheduled for consideration today by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Each of the Regents institutions made a presentation defining its role and scope at the October Regents' meeting.

"The Regents felt all of the mission statements were too general," said Charles Reagan, assistant to the University president. "So they asked their staff to draft one-page mission statements."

University officials received an advance copy of the mission statement for K-State. The degree programs for the College of Education were not included on the original draft.

Reagan did not want to speculate on the reasons for this omission of the programs in education.

"They certainly didn't intend for K-State not to continue its academic programs in education," Reagan said.

The Regents' executive director, Stan Koplik, was contacted by the administration. He agreed to propose an amendment to the document, Reagan said.

The amendment, a single sentence, would state that the University will continue its bachelor's, master's and doctoral programs in education.

"In December, the Regents will vote on formal adoption of the statements," Reagan said.

The last mission statements were adopted by the Regents in 1978. The recent call for such statements was an effort to examine the possible overlap and duplication in higher education in Kansas, said Don Hoyt, director of planning and evaluative services.

"Their expectation was, as unrealistic as it may be, to have universities defer their programs to other institutions," Hoyt said.

Reagan said the University has certain procedures to follow for the discontinuation of any program.

"What they're asking for is impossible to deliver," Reagan said. "You just can't announce one morning that you've discontinued a program."

In addition to the role and scope study reports, the two-day meeting will address several policy recommendations.

One recommendation is to no longer grant associate degrees at Regents institutions where a bachelor's degree already is offered, Reagan said.

K-State has one such program with Fort Riley.

"They may make an exception for Fort Riley," Reagan said. This is one the Regents have allowed in the past.

Another recommendation deals with the discontinuation of business schools becoming accredited. K-State and the University of Kansas are the only Regents institutions accredited at this point, Reagan said.

He said the action will not affect Wichita State's current accreditation process.

Student Senate to consider representation legislation

By The Collegian Staff

Once again, the Student Referendum Bill is up for a vote at tonight's Student Senate meeting. Voting on the bill was postponed two weeks ago after the majority of Senate members believed the bill needed to be revised to include more information.

The bill proposes that students be allowed to vote on whether they would like to be represented in Senate by their living group or by their college.

If approved, students will vote on the bill during regular elections in February. If the proposal is approved by the students, Senate would be restructured to represent the two groups. The representation ratio would provide for 24 senators elected from their college and 24 "living-group" senators.

Currently, more than two-thirds of the Senators live in greek housing.

Also to be voted on tonight is a bill proposing a solution to prevent any future Aggieville disturbances following the K-State-University of Kansas football game.

The bill recommends that the Aggieville Merchants Association close down Aggieville for the entire day of the game to alleviate the potential for further damage to the University's reputation and Aggieville businesses.

If passed, the bill will be presented as a recommendation to the Aggieville Merchants Association and the city.

Other issues to be dealt with include revisions to the University Activities Board By-Laws and special allocations to Student Governing Association to pay for this year's Royal Purple pictures.

Bills to receive first reading tonight include an allocations proposal to the K-State Debate team, a proposal to change SGA election dates and a measure to repeal SGA's expenditure limits.

Senate meets at 7 p.m. in the Union Big Eight Room.

Regents choose K-State program for application to accreditation

By MAUREEN MURPHY
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Board of Regents selected K-State's leisure studies program to be the only one to apply for accreditation in the state, said Don Lindley, coordinator and associate professor of leisure studies.

The Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies is aiming to receive accreditation for the program by the fall of 1988. The application process for accreditation begins in January, said Brenda Wiggins, temporary instructor of physical education, dance and leisure studies.

If K-State offers the only accredited program in the state, more leisure studies students will be attracted to the University, Lindley said. Two core classes and five specialized classes also would be added to the curriculum.

Students in leisure studies can choose between two degree options. The program administration option offers students job opportunities in private, commercial or public recreation. Examples of these are positions with cruise lines, resorts or corporations. The therapeutic option offers students opportunities in a clinical-type setting, Wiggins said.

Students graduating in leisure studies before the program receives accreditation do not find graduating from an unaccredited department to be negative.

Lindley said there are other ways after graduating from K-State to receive certification. One way is to be a provisional professional. In short, this means the individual waits for two years before taking an exam to be certified by the state, Wiggins said.

"I think it's a great major," said Holly Dastmalchian, senior in leisure studies. "There are a lot of opportunities and open doors in it."

Students are required to complete a pre-internship program their sophomore or junior year and an internship the last semester of their senior year, Wiggins said.

She said the students spend considerable time working with the community. Many times, they are called on to set up programs for different community activities.

"We feel students get a lot of hands-on experience before getting out in the real world," Wiggins said.

Next fall, the National Council on Accreditation will send a visitation team to examine the leisure studies program. The visit will include observing different classes, talking with students and evaluating the overall program, said Roy Hunter, temporary assistant professor of leisure studies.

Many of the students who are in leisure studies get dual majors in public relations and general business, Dastmalchian said.

Wiggins said foreign language is a big asset to leisure studies majors because many of the job opportunities are overseas or in states that are becoming bilingual.

Mail Service to move to Dykstra; Anderson makes room for offices

By The Collegian Staff

The KSU Central Mail Service in Anderson Hall will close Nov. 26, and be relocated to Dykstra Hall, reopening at its new location Dec. 1, said Evelyn Hupe, administrative officer.

The postal service, which has been located on the main floor of Anderson for more than 30 years, was occupying too much valuable space, Hupe said. She said the space will be converted to offices.

The mail unit consists of a Contract Post Office, metering services for University business mail and receiving, sorting and distribution services. The plan for moving the unit has been in the makings for several months, Hupe said. She said the final decision was made about six weeks ago.

Although the main postal services will be provided in Dykstra, some mail receptacles will remain in Anderson, Hupe said.

"We're just going to pick up the whole unit of mail boxes and drop boxes and move them downstairs," she said.

In addition, she said, mail receptacles will be installed on the east side of the Union and in front of Dykstra. Signs also will be posted on campus alerting students to the stamp machines and mail receptacles in the basement of the Union.

"There are an awful lot of people who don't know they are there," she said.

Hupe said Dykstra was selected as the best building in which to relocate because it could service all three units of the mail service. She said the metering and distribution units could have been placed anywhere on campus, but the Contract Post Office needed a more strategic location.

The Contract Post Office is a regular, federal post office through which 90 percent of Manhattan's international mail is serviced. Thus, Hupe said, it requires a location with easily accessible parking.

The parking lot adjacent to Dykstra will be utilized for this purpose. The 30-minute visitor parking will be converted to 15-minute post-office parking, Hupe said. The lot consists of one handicap parking space and four other spaces.

As to the reaction of students and faculty, who are accustomed to the Anderson location, Hupe said, "I think that once the operation is moved and people get used to it, they will forget that it was ever (in Anderson) in the first place."

University Police Department cracks down on invalid use of campus parking permits

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

The KSU Police Department is cracking down on people found to have a parking permit on their car that was reported stolen or lost.

"We have recovered quite a few lately," Richard Herrman, University dectective, said of stolen or lost permits. Approximately 140 permits have been reported as stolen or lost this semester.

The parking permits do not require a sticker with a corresponding number to be placed on the car window as has been required in previous years.

"This has been an on-going problem most of the year," Herrman said. Complaints were frequent about having to put stickers on the window or bumper of the car. So the decision was made to only require a permit hanging from the rear-view mirror. Easing complaints in one area might have caused another problem, Herrman said. But there is no single cause that can be blamed for the stolen parking permits.

All K-State police officers and student ticketers have the list of stolen or lost permits, Herrman said. Each car is checked to make sure the parking permit number is not on the list. If one is found, the driver of the car is given a $25 ticket for illegal registration, Herrman said.

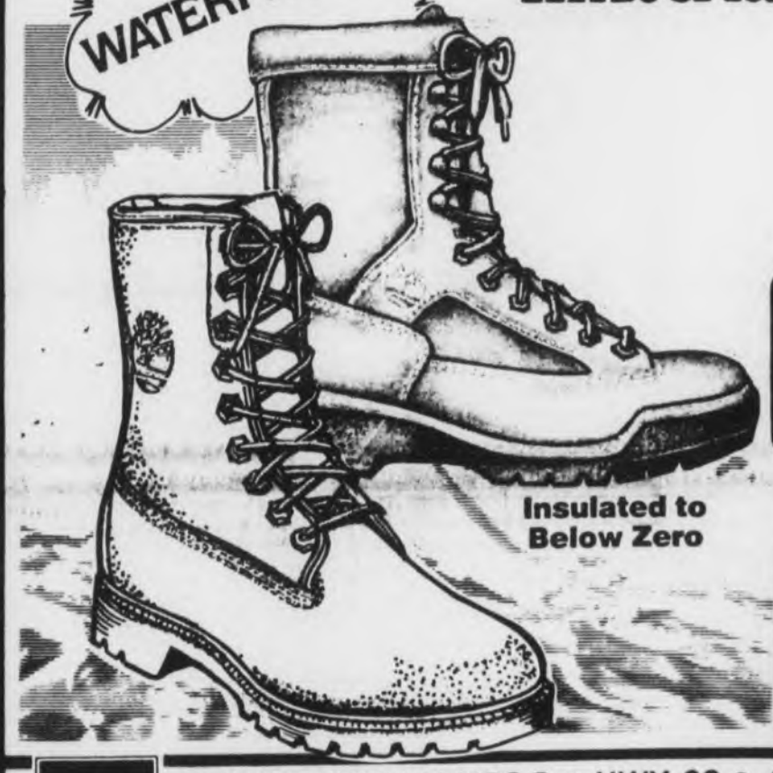
If possible, a wheel lock is placed on the car costing $20 for removal. The person driving the car is then charged with deprivation of property and must report to the Riley County attorney for an additional fine, Herrman said.

No matter how someone acquires the parking permit, the person is considered to be in possession of stolen property, Herrman said. The police have a complete record of each car registered on campus. Stealing a parking permit and using it is the equivalent of stealing a license plate and putting it on another car to use, he said.

"When we find a stolen permit, we find all kinds of excuses," Herrman said.

Many times, a student buys a permit, sells it to a friend, reports the permit as stolen or lost and receives another one for only $5, Herrman said. Another common occurrence is when family members with more than one vehicle at school split the cost of one permit and share it.

Those who report losing a permit have had excuses like "my dog chewed it up" or "my kid threw it out the window," Herrman said. But a lot are legitimately lost and never found.



The money paid by those who are ticketed for the alleged theft goes back into the parking fees account for the University, Herrman said. It is then utilized for the upkeep of University parking lots.

Descent into Darkness

Cave wall graffiti proved that the 35 K-State students who traveled more than 300 miles this past weekend to explore two central Missouri caves were not the first to arrive.

As far back as 1967, "Linda 'n Carl" were apparently packing a can of black spray paint into the deepest inner recesses of Saltpeter Cave, even scaling a 40-foot vertical shaft to leave their mark at the top.

For the most part, student participants in the Union Program Council's spelunking expedition didn't join the trip in hopes of making new archaeological discoveries, but "to do something they haven't ever done before," said Mike Penner, graduate student in student counseling and personal services and UPC program adviser.

Students return yearly to explore the privately owned Saltpeter and Keetswetter caves that have remained "undeveloped" by the tourist industry, Penner said.

"The last cave I was in had lighted sidewalks and an elevator," said Larry Long, senior in agricultural mechanization. Such accommodations are as foreign to a cave as graffiti.

Individuals who fear small enclosed spaces would not appreciate this brand of adventure. Cavers crouched when space prohibited standing, crawled when there was no room to crouch and stretched out flat on belly or back to inch through spaces too tight even to rollover.

"I wouldn't try that hole if you've got more than a 31-inch waist," said returning caver Doug Kroencke, junior in mechanical engineering, as he pointed out an obstacle in Keetswetter Cave. "Last year, I went through it and had to scrape off a little hide to get back out. But that's better than waiting a few days to lose the weight."

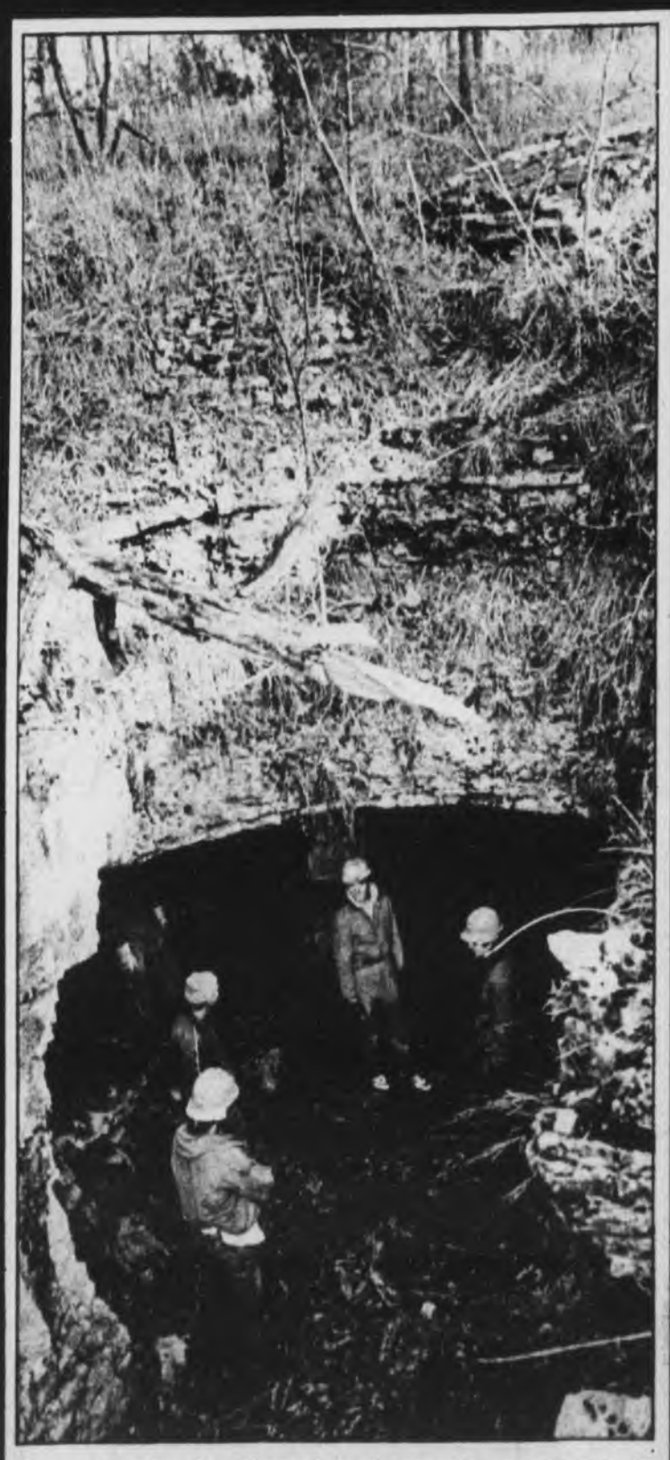
Saturday morning the group was divided in two — half setting out north of Dolittle to Saltpeter Cave while the rest left for Keetswetter.

That afternoon in Saltpeter, 17 individuals hunched down in a foot of icy water to fit through a knee-high space leading to the back of the cave.

"Who took us through here? I didn't say I was Daniel Boone," someone protested in the darkness.

"Your idea of an adventure is checking out a new shopping mall," came the response.

The hazards of spelunking can be minimized with the appropriate attire.



UPC recommendations include wearing two layers of old clothing so the muddy outer layer can be shed at the end of the day to protect car interiors.

More specifically, brightly colored clothing should

An opening in the Missouri earth reveals an entrance to Saltpeter Cave, where spelunkers discuss their next move.

Scott Ewing, freshman in construction science, maneuvers through columns of stalagtites, which have grown long enough to reach the floor of Saltpeter Cave. The trip was sponsored by the Union Program Council.

Campus survey shows eating disorder victims include men

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

A recent survey shows that 10 percent of K-State students are affected by bulimia, popularly known as the binge-purge syndrome.

Laura Hill, a doctoral student completing her dissertation on "A Psychotherapeutic Approach to the Eating Disorder, Bulimia," obtained a representative sample by focusing predominately on undergraduate students in residence halls.

The survey was randomly distributed to every fourth male and every fifth female in Ford, Goodnow and Haymaker halls. The percentage of men to women who participated paralleled the student ratio on campus, Hill said.

Of the 400 surveys distributed, Hill received a 70-percent return.

Although a binge can range anywhere between 1,000 to 55,000 calories, the average binge consists of 3,500 calories, Hill said. In determining the number of bulimics on campus, Hill applied a conservative binge definition requiring 3,500 calories or more to be consumed in two hours or less.

"I wanted to be so sure I was getting a true binge," she said.

Hill found that 69 percent of the bulimics were women and 31 percent were men. She said this was a new finding than the past, where nine out of 10 bulimics were said to be women.

"It doesn't appear to be solely a female disorder," she said.

A bulimic generally consumes in one setting what a normal person would eat in a 36-hour period, Hill said.

She described a typical binge as "eating several doughnuts, a gallon of ice cream and possibly a few hamburgers and french fries in between." It usually consists of "no-no" foods, she said.

Of the students surveyed, one-third have at some point binged on 3,500 calories or more in less than one hour. The students were depressed and lonely before the binge, and felt guilty and tired afterward.

Although the time of day a person is most likely to binge varied, the majority appear to binge from 10 p.m. to midnight, the survey showed.

Hill said present diagnostic criteria used by physicians does not require a person to purge to be considered bulimic. The criteria of her dissertation, which is to be published this spring, requires purging, she said.

According to survey results, only 12 percent of the students purge. Vomiting was overwhelmingly the predominate means, Hill said. Other methods commonly used include laxatives, diuretics and diet pills accompanied with excessive amounts of exercise, she said.

The survey showed almost 20 percent purge after every binge. Also, a surprising 70 percent purge without a prior binge. Students were disgusted and depressed before a purge, and felt guilty but somewhat relieved after the purge.

Hill said death can occur with purging from internal bleeding, choking while regurgitating and loss of electrolytes — a vital body chemical substance.

Of those surveyed, nearly half would be upset over a 1-pound weight gain, whereas almost 60 percent would be pleased upon losing 3 pounds. Over half have dieted at some point in time, although the preferred method was to skip meals.

Eating disorders tend to fall on a continuum, Hill said. About 50 percent of anorexics become bulimic. At times, the two overlap, resulting in a bulimic-anorexic who does not purge, yet frequently skips meals following a binge, Hill said.

While anorexia generally prevails at the high-school level, Hill said bulimia usually occurs during the college years in women 18 and older.

An educational program providing information about the latest facts on bulimia will be offered in January for students wanting to increase their knowledge on the topic, Hill said. Students are encouraged to sign up in Holton 103 or in the Counseling Center if they meet one or more of the following criteria:

—Recurrent episodes of binge eating (the rapid consumption of a large amount of food in a discrete period of time).

—Fear of not being able to stop during eating binges.

—Engaging in self-induced vomiting, abuse of laxatives or rigorous dieting and/or fasting in order to counteract the effects of binge eating.

—A minimum average of two binge-eating episodes a week for at least three months.

—Persistent overconcern with body shape and weight.

Transportation service provides independence for elderly citizens

By LORI STEVENS
Collegian Reporter

An older adult unable to drive a car may feel trapped — stranded at home with no way to get to the doctor, go grocery shopping or run errands without asking a friend or relative for help.

To help these older adults, the Aging Transportation Agency has created a bus service that will pick up any elderly person who lives within the Manhattan city limits if that person calls and gives a 24-hour notice.

The buses have no set route; the schedule is made out for the following day after all calls are received. This saves time by making the most efficient routes without backtracking. The only times the routes are changed are for medical appointments, which take top priority and don't need to be called in 24 hours in advance.

Bill McAndrews has been the director of the ATA for seven years. McAndrews is retired from the military and worked on his masters in horticulture at K-State.

"I became interested in geriatrics after some of the social work classes I was taking," McAndrews said. "This eventually led to my involvement with the ATA."

The ATA will take older adults to doctor, dentist and lawyer appointments, social engagements and even grocery shopping. The buses run from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The ATA services are not limited to Manhattan. Every other Friday, a bus brings people from Leonardville, Randolph and Riley to run errands or meet appointments in Manhattan.

McAndrews said he hires the bus drivers himself. Drivers must have previous experience, a clean driving record and the ability to get along with older adults.

"The most important thing I consider when selecting bus drivers is that they are very compassionate," he said. "I prefer them to be over 60, so they can understand the problems of the elderly."

The ATA service was established in 1974 by a group of older adults who were unable to drive themselves. They could not afford to constantly take taxis, so they rented a bus.

Maintaining the bus was a problem for the group, so they approached the city for help. In 1975, the first ATA bus was purchased with a bank note and low fares were charged to the passengers.

By 1978, a new bus with a lift for wheelchairs was purchased with community development funds. Having a lift was important because many more passengers in wheelchairs were starting to ride, McAndrews said.

Another bus is on order that will cost around $23,000, he said. Seventy percent of the funding for this bus will come from the Federal Department of Transportation and the Kansas Department of Transportation, and the other 30 percent will come from the ATA.

Bus drivers are the only hired help on the ATA buses, McAndrews said.

"We need volunteers for the entire year," he said.

Volunteers help the passengers get on and off the bus with any packages they may have.

"The volunteers are not to interfere with the elderly, (but) only help them if they need it," he said. "We don't want to restrict their independence."

The general response of the elderly has been positive.

"They are happy with it," McAndrews said. "They feel it is a needed service."

Kansas City comedian to perform for students in Union Catskeller

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

Comedian David Naster has come a long way since playing local clubs around Kansas City and touring the Midwest. Naster might be approaching the verge of national prominence as a stand-up comedian. Local residents may judge for themselves when he performs at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in the Union Catskeller.

Although Naster has had exposure on cable and syndicated television and has toured colleges nationwide, even bigger things are in the works, he said in a telephone interview Thursday.

Naster's five years of work in stand-up comedy are finally paying off in the form of lucrative commercials and national television exposure, as well as other cable TV shows.

Naster is negotiating with "The Tonight Show" and "The David Letterman Show," and he said he hopes to make an appearance soon. Naster's most promising opportunity at national exposure may be with David Brenner.

"David Brenner wants me and they're looking at tapes right now," Naster said.

Comedian Rodney Dangerfield also is interested in Naster appearing in his nightclub, Dangerfield's, and his upcoming Home Box Office special. Appearing on HBO won't be a new experience for Naster, who has played a part in two HBO specials, "Circus Vegas" and "World Burlesque."

Naster also is slated to appear in his own special on "Laff Track," on the USA Network.

Currently, Naster is appearing at college campuses across the nation. A University of Kansas graduate, he said he enjoys returning to the college scene and has just added a nomination for "The College Campus Comedian of the Year Award" to his list of achievements. Naster has appeared at more than 200 colleges in 40 states in his career and said he hopes to wrap up his current campus tour the second week of December.

When Naster comes to K-State, he will bring with him a show he describes as part stand-up, part percussion and drums and part clowning. Some of the material is suggestive, but it's not dirty, he said.

"The show is nothing like Eddie Murphy's, but it's not like 'The King Family Show' either," he said.

Naster's experiences at nightclubs and colleges have led him to the conclusion that "when there's liquor in the room, people want (the show) dirty."

Naster said he enjoys the looseness of a nightclub, but considers some offensive material as merely "cheap laughs." He has found that college students don't want that kind of material in his shows.

"College students are kind of funny," Naster said. "They want cuter types of things. Fun and cute."

Naster appeases the college crowd by giving them what they want in the form of sendups of different types of people and TV shows.

Naster is not a stranger to Manhattan. He appeared at Bushwacker's, 531 N. Manhattan Ave, last summer and will be there again in three weeks. Naster said he likes the semblance at Bushwacker's because the people come to see a comedy show and aren't just there to drink. Last summer's show helped raise money for the Vietnam War Memorial in Junction City.

Two more events in Naster's life will be or are taking place in Kansas City. He has been selected as the master of ceremonies at this year's lighting of Crown Center's Christmas lights. He also has been chosen as spokesman for the Kansas City Comets soccer team and is currently on its promotional commercials.

The doors of the Catskeller open at 7 p.m. Tickets will be available at the door for $2.50.

Professor promotes program for students to study abroad

Students can study abroad for about the same cost as attending K-State, Walter Kolonosky, associate professor of modern languages and the director of the Office for Study Abroad, said at an informational meeting Wednesday for those interested in foreign study.

K-State is participating as an exchange school in the International Student Exchange Program for the second year, Kolonosky said. The program offers a reciprocal exchange program for students in the United States with more than 80 universities around the world.

Students involved in the ISEP program pay tuition, room and board for their home university. Then, they attend a university abroad in exchange for foreign students who come to their university, Kolonosky said.

This year, six K-State students are studying at schools in Finland, France, Fiji and Africa while six students from those schools attend classes here, he said.

"Economically, the program offers students a good deal and a good opportunity to study abroad because the cost is constant," Kolonosky said.

Transportation, travel, books and incidental expenses are not included in the set cost, he said.

Students apply to ISEP in the same way they apply to a university, he said. They need to complete an application, obtain recommendations and provide ISEP with a transcript. As a part of the application, students write a one-page essay on why they would like to study abroad.

Applications for studies beginning next September need to be in by the end of this semester. From K-State, the applications go to the ISEP central office at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C, where final selections and placements are made. Students should find out where they will be studying by March or April, he said.

Kolonosky said the best time to apply to the program is during the sophomore year of college so that the studies abroad are completed during the junior year. However, the program is offered to other levels, including graduate students, he said.

Fluency in a foreign language, while an asset, is not a requirement for participation in the program, Kolonosky said. Many of the exchange schools offer programs in English for students who have not had a foreign language. Those applying for foreign language programs should have completed at least four semesters of that language, he said.

In most cases, the credits earned abroad can be transferred and applied towards a degree. Kolonosky recommended that students go to their departments and get agreements for credit in advance.

ISEP provides a microfiche library of the catalogs of all its member schools on the fourth floor of Farrell Library so that students can look up specific course information, he said.

In addition to its economic benefits, Kolonosky said ISEP provides good public relations for K-State and the other member schools in becoming more widely known.

The biggest benefit of ISEP is its accessibility to many students who otherwise could not have afforded foreign study, he said.

Wayman who? Now, 'Choo' rules

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Darryl Kennedy lived in the obscurity of Wayman Tisdale for two years on Oklahoma's basketball team.

Kennedy, the Sooners' All-Big Eight forward, broke away from that shadow last season when he poured in a team-high 21 points and grabbed 8.2 rebounds per contest.

Let it be known: Darryl "Choo" Kennedy is a bonafide All-American possibility this year.

Unlike his close friend, Oklahoma's colorful linebacker Brian Bosworth, the usually loose-lipped Kennedy said he is going to let his on-court play "speak" for him this season. It remains to be seen if he will be able to keep quiet the entire season.

"I don't really compare players," Kennedy said, "the press does that. I believe I should get a few things and they should get a few things. But I don't compare myself with them."

Sport Magazine rated the 6-foot-5 senior the best small forward in the nation and named him to its preseason All-American team.

The University of Oklahoma's Darryl "Choo" Kennedy is small in stature for a Big Eight forward at 6-5, but he is big on self-assuredness and has the ability to back up his boasts. Kennedy is expected to help lead the Sooners to the conference title.

Top 20 ranks list K-State's harrier teams

By The Collegian Staff

Both of K-State's cross country teams have qualified for the national meet Monday in Tuscon, Ariz., and accordingly, each team was ranked in the NCAA Division I top-20 rankings released Wednesday.

The Wildcat women, previously ranked as high as No. 6, dropped to ninth in the poll. The men's squad cracked the rankings for the first time this season and were listed 20th.

K-State's women finished second at the District Five meet Saturday at Peoria, Ill., and the Wildcat men placed third.

"Six schools have two teams going to nationals and K-State is one of them," Coach John Capriotti said. "I'm very proud of that fact. I've said all along that K-State can be as successful as any college in America."

Other Big Eight Conference members listed in the rankings include Colorado and Nebraska. Colorado is ranked No. 4 in the men's division and eighth in the women's poll, while the Nebraska men nailed down 10th and the women 16th.

Texas topped the pack in the women's rankings and Arkansas is at the top of the men's poll.

Rounding out the top five teams in the women's poll are Wisconsin, Alabama, Brigham Young and UCLA.

Other top five choices in the men's rankings are Arizona, Wisconsin, Colorado and Texas.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Three years ago there was a question in Norman, Okla., which every basketball fan seemed to be asking — "Is there life after Wayman Tisdale?"

After two fairly successful post-Wayman seasons for the Sooners, this appears to be the season which doubters will hear a resounding "You bet!"

Throughout the years, Oklahoma teams have gained the image as a choker — a team that can't win the big one. There is a hungry determination in the eyes of OU's players that says, "Not this year."

This season's Oklahoma team might be the finest ever. The key — depth. Coach Billy Tubbs isn't dealing with the kind of depth in which certain players can come and get certain things accomplished.

Oh, no. Tubbs has the unique luxury of being able to throw multiple weapons at his opponents. He is blessed with a number of players who can do it all.

No matter how modest Tubbs attempted to be Sunday at the annual Big Eight Preseason Press Day, he couldn't hide the fact that his Sooners are loaded and should spend much of the season towards the top of the national rankings.

"I think we have a very good chance (at being succesful), but keep in mind I said chance," Tubbs said.

"For this team to accomplish everything which has been projected," he said, "we can't just play up to our maximum ability — we'll have to play a little better."

Tubbs' weapons make his chances for success very good. The most potent of those weapons comes in a powerful 6-foot-5 package called "Choo."

Darryl "Choo" Kennedy is landing on many preseason All-American lists and is nudging out Kansas' Danny Manning as many's projected Big Eight Player of the Year. Last season, Kennedy averaged 21 points and eight rebounds a game, but he isn't the only one with outstanding ability.

Also on the Sooners' roster is another projected preseason All-American and a bonafide candidate for Player of the Year accolades. Off-guard Tim McCalister averaged 18.2 points a game last season and led the squad in assists.

But the list doesn't even come close to ending there. Also returning is a powerful inside player — David Johnson. Tack on another 14 points and six rebounds a game under Johnson's credentials.

There are six other returnees for Tubbs to evaluate, but even more damage comes in the players Tubbs grabbed from the junior-college ranks.

If last year's Sooners had two weaknesses, it was their lack of an effective point guard and a dominant big man inside. Well, those problems seemed to be easily solved by Tubbs.

Enter juco All-Americans Harvey Grant and Rickey Grace. The 6-9 Grant comes to Norman from Independence Community Junior College where many called him an even greater juco talent than Walter Berry was prior to going to St. John's. Grant currently is sidelined with a broken wrist, leaving Tubbs drooling for his return.

Grace might even be a brighter gem for the Sooners. The Sporting News ranked the 6-1 Midland (Texas) Junior College transfer as the sixth-best juco player in the nation last season.

If it isn't bad enough for other Big Eight coaches that Tubbs has 11 players this season who he believes can play on the Big Eight level, he has talked of finding his top eight and redshirting the rest to save a year's eligibility.

That probably means the Sooners aren't going any place — they plan on building themselves a camp towards the top of the conference

Recruits not adjusting to Brown's coaching

KANSAS

Last Season's Record:
35-4/13-1 (1st in conference)
Collegian's Projected Finish: 3rd
Projected All-Big Eight Performers:
Danny Manning (1st Team)
Cedric Hunter (2nd Team)

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Larry Brown cast his line at the Big Eight Preseason Press Day hoping everyone would swallow the bait.

He received not a nibble.

"I felt we were pretty good," Brown said, "until I started coaching our kids."

It seems Kansas' crew of high school All-Americans are not performing up to Brown's stringent standards. But then, after taking last year's team to the Final Four in Dallas, the fourth-year Jayhawk coach expects nothing but the best in Lawrence.

"If we had Archie (Marshall) back," Brown said, "I would say we are as good as anybody in the country. We have some pretty good young players. Right now, I don't think they are adjusting like we would like."

Marshall is sidelined for the year while rehabilitating a knee injury sustained in Kansas' Final Four loss to Duke.

Brown, who came to Kansas with a suitcase full of travel tags and a vagabond reputation, is now the dean of Kansas coaches. Gone are longtime Sunflower State stalwarts Jack Hartman of K-State and Gene Smithson of Wichita State. Brown apparently has planted his roots in Lawrence for good — or at least until North Carolina coach Dean Smith decides to retire to the coaching Hall of Fame. Brown has been rumored to be the next of kin at North Carolina.

While Brown is saying this year's team is not responding the way he had hoped this early in the preseason, everyone is letting the talk go over their heads. Brown has taken KU to three consecutive National Collegiate Athletic Association tournaments and a Big Eight Conference crown last year.

Gone from those teams are three mainstay's of Brown's inherited Jayhawks — Ron Kellog, Greg Dreiling and Calvin Thompson. For the first time in Brown's collegiate coaching career, he is coaching a team with all his recruits.

Anchoring those recruits is All-American and 1986 Big Eight Player of the Year Danny Manning. The weight of the Jayhawks' postseason travel plans rest squarely on his 6-foot-11 shoulders. It was a chore that was not placed upon him in his first two seasons.

"This season," Brown said, "when Danny catches the ball eight feet from the basket and doesn't shoot, I yell at him, where in the past I didn't mind."

Because of the added reliance on Manning, Brown foresees an abundance of zone defenses designed to pack in the middle and keep Manning from dominating. This should be a usual occurrence until the Jayhawks prove to opponents they possess other weapons.

One weapon should be point guard Cedric Hunter who, along with Manning, is the only other consensus returning starter from last year's squad. Brown ranks Hunter with the best guards in the nation.

"I went to see North Carolina practice last week," said Brown, who played and coached under Tar Heels' mentor Smith. "They have two of the best guards in the nation in Jeff Lebo and Kenny Smith. Cedric can do all those things they do."

Brown was counting on 6-10 center Sean Alvarado, a Hutchinson Community College transfer, to step into the post spot so he could free up Manning out on the wing. But Manning may not have that luxury unless Alvarado starts making a smoother transition to Division I basketball.

"Sean is really struggling," said a disappointed Brown. "He's Ed's (Manning, assistant coach) project. Ed seems to work with him better than I do. He relates to the big guys."

If Brown, "the Wizard of Oz," can blend his new harvested talent with last year's holdovers through a rugged non-conference schedule, the Big Eight may be in for another season of watching KU follow the "yellow brick road" all the way to the Final Four in New Orleans.

KU wins 84-78 against Soviets

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Forward Danny Manning scored 28 points and Mark Turgeon added 17 to lead Kansas to an 84-78 victory Wednesday night over the Soviet National Team in an exhibition basketball game.

The game before a sellout crowd of 15,800 marked the end of a 14-game U.S. tour that left the Soviet team with an 8-6 record.

After trailing 39-38 at halftime, Kansas tied the game with 17:48 left at 44-44 on a layup by Turgeon. The Jayhawks extended their lead to 62-49 on a jumper by Chris Piper with 11:28 left.

Schmidt wins NL MVP

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Mike Schmidt, the 37-year-old third baseman of the Philadelphia Phillies, was named the National League's Most Valuable Player on Wednesday for the third time, and said he wanted to win once more next year before retiring.

"I'm gearing up for next year in hopes of being at this podium again," Schmidt said at a news conference. "I'm going to try awfully hard."

Schmidt, who led the league in home runs and runs batted in, said he was not looking beyond 1987, adding that his thoughts about retiring had not changed since the season ended.

He said three things might convince him to change his mind.

"If my knees are OK, if my wife and family can cope with another year or two and the club is a contender...But unless I fall flat on my face next season I want to go out on top. I've invested and done well and I'm able to leave."

Schmidt, who also captured the award in 1980 and 1981, became only the seventh three-time MVP winner in the major leagues since the award began in 1931. He joined Stan Musial of the St. Louis Cardinals, who won in 1943, 1946, and 1948, and Roy Campanella of the Dodgers, who won in 1951, 1953 and 1955, in the National League.

Four American Leaguers, Jimmy Foxx of the defunct Philadelphia A's and Boston Red Sox and Joe DiMaggio, Yogi Berra and Mickey Mantle, all of the New York Yankees, won the award three times.

Schmidt totaled 287 points to beat runnerup Glenn Davis, outfielder for the Houston Astros, who collected 231 in voting by members of the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Allen County guard signs with 'Cat basketball team

By The Collegian Staff

In continuing his recruiting quest for junior-college basketball talent, first-year men's head basketball coach Lon Kruger announced Wednesday the signing of Rene "Buster" Glover.

Glover, a 6-foot, 160-pound guard from Allen County Community College, signed a national letter-of-intent Wednesday to play for K-State during the 1987-88 season.

Glover, who averaged 15.3 points per game last season at Allen County in Iola, is averaging more than 20 points per outing this season and has led the Red Devils to a 3-0 record so far this year. Last season, Glover was selected as a member of the All-Kansas Jayhawk Juco Conference first team.

"We are very pleased with Buster's decision to attend Kansas State University," Kruger said. "He has excellent guard skills and will fit into our program very well."

Glover becomes the second athlete to sign with K-State during the NCAA's early signing period.

Carlos Diggins, a 6-4, 200-pound guard/forward from Butler County Community College in El Dorado, signed last week with the Wildcat basketball program for the 1987-88 campaign.

Carlin questions Hayden's budget plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin on Wednesday expressed reservations about his successor's decision to cut $59.7 million from state agency budgets to prevent a projected $13 million deficit on June 30.

"It's not going to come out very well if he stays with an across-the-boards approach," Carlin said in an interview late Wednesday.

Carlin was reacting to news that Gov.-elect Mike Hayden had ordered a 3.8 percent blanket reduction in the $1.57 billion state spending authorized by the 1986 Legislature.

"I believe he's going to get at what I recommended, but he's taking a little different approach," Carlin said.

Earlier this month, the retiring governor said "selective cuts," which target some agencies while protecting others, were preferable to a universal approach to budget reductions which makes everyone suffer equally.

Hayden, however, opted for an across-the-boards reduction and told the directors of every state agency to make preparations to cut their spending by 3.8 percent. Each state agency director is to formulate a plan for carrying out the order and submit the plan to Hayden's budget office.

"As I understand it, these are not his recommendations to the Legislature," Carlin said. "Instead, I think these are just his way of getting the process started. I think this is just his first step which will lead him to make the selective cuts.

"I know he wants me to stay in touch with my people in the state agencies to find out if these cuts will cause too much pain, or if the reductions simply don't make sense."

Carlin said he believes Hayden will discover that some agencies, such as corrections and the welfare departments, may not be able to shoulder as much of a reduction as others, such as the education agencies.

"I think the total numbers he's talking about will stay damn close," Carlin said. "But I think the specific numbers for each agency will change quite a bit."

The spending reductions were prompted by a financial report on Nov. 6 that lawmakers can expect a $93.6 million shortfall in income from state taxes. A shortfall of that magnitude would cause a $13 million deficit unless action is taken to cut spending or increase taxes. The Kansas Constitution prohibits state government from deficit spending.

Increased car sales affect U.S. economy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's economy, bolstered by a boom in car sales and hefty defense spending, grew at a respectable 2.9 percent annual rate last summer, substantially better than the dismal performance during the spring, the government reported Wednesday.

While the Reagan administration hailed the increase as proof that the long-awaited rebound in economic growth is under way, private economists expressed fears that the strength could be short-lived.

Enrollments rise slightly at Kansas universities

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Thanks mainly to one of the largest freshman classes in the University of Kansas' history, enrollment at the state's six regent universities and Washburn University increased slightly in the fall as compared to last year.

According to figures released Wednesday by the Legislative Research Department, enrollment in the fall semester was 86,177 students. That represents an increase of 709 students over the fall 1985 semester, or .8 percent.

Total enrollment statewide in institutions of higher education, including junior colleges and private colleges, stood at 143,161, an increase of 1,789 or 1.3 percent.

For purposes of computing state aid to education, students are counted on a full-time basis. Using that method of counting, the number of students enrolled statewide is 101,215 this semester, which is 1,608 more than last year or an increase of 1.6 percent.

The numbers were compiled by the research department and presented the Legislative Educational Planning Committee.

The full-time equivalent student enrollment at the six regents schools and Washburn was 67,828, an increase of 602 students or .9 percent. Again, KU paced all other institutions in full-time equivalent enrollment with 23,094, an increase of 912 over last year.

Only KU, Kansas State University and Pittsburg State University reported total enrollment increases.

At KU, the freshman class totaled 6,592, full and part-time, and pushed the university's enrollment to 25,822 — a jump of 1,048 over last year or a 4.2 percent increase.

K-State reported a headcount of 17,285 total students, 121 more than 1985. The bulk of K-State's gains also came in the freshman category.

Pittsburg State's enrollment for the fall was 5,497, or 138 higher than 1985. Unlike the state's two largest universities, PSU's gains were spread over its freshman, junior and senior classes.

Wichita State University, the third largest school in the regent system, showed a net loss of 59 in its enrollment, which stood at 16,843 despite an increase of 163 in the size of its freshman class. Wichita State had 100 dropouts in both its sophomore class and undergraduate special student category and lost 148 juniors.

Emporia State University showed an enrollment of 5,230 for the fall semester, a drop of 114 students or 2.1 percent. The freshman class and master's programs reflected the largest losses at Emporia.

Fort Hays State University also lost ground with an enrollment of 5,538, which is 119 less than last year, or 2.1 percent. Student losses were recorded in Fort Hays' freshman, sophomore and senior classes and its master's programs.

The Kansas Technical Institute in Salina saw its enrollment plunge to 513, a drop of 152 over last year or 22.9 percent.

Washburn University of Topeka, a municipal school which is not a part of the regents system, suffered a 220 student drop, or 3.2 percent, as enrollment stood at 6,610.

The University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City joined the main Lawrence campus in reporting enrollment gains. There were 2,437 students at the medical school in the fall, 70 more than last year or 3 percent.

At the K-State school of veterinary medicine, enrollment was 402 this fall, or four fewer students.

be worn to alert area deer hunters of a human presence. The best shirt is one with sleeves that can be hacked off with a pocket knife when it gets uncomfortably wet.

Footgear should be boots or old tennis shoes that will provide traction even when caked with layers of clay mud.

Other essential gear includes kneepads, gloves, a flashlight with spare batteries and some sort of head protection.

Midway through Saltpeter Cave, Long announced it was time to turn off the flashlights and do some science.

"A guy told me about a theory that the human eye is so sensitive that if you sit in total darkness for 10 minutes, you'll be able to see electrons bouncing off the cones in your eyes," he said.

Darkness.

"So this is what it's like to not have eyes."

"Imagine trying to get out of here without a flashlight."

"We'd have to eat bats."

"Before they ate us."

About two minutes of pitch black was enough to convince the group to abandon a theory about the sensitivity of eyes that couldn't see anything, let alone electrons, in the dark.

"What are we looking for anyway?"

WHACK! "Hard hat just paid for itself."

Leaving the motel shortly after 7 a.m. Sunday gave one of the groups an early start on the Keetswetter Cave. Extensive clusters of crystalized white stalactites and stalagmites under an everpresent film of mud were almost a reward for the belly-sliding through mud and standing pools of water necessary to get inside the cave.

Sunday afternoon, after taking showers and packing cars, the 35 students faced the prospect of returning from caves to classrooms.

"You need to do it once in a while — not stay in the University all the time," said Itzhak Ben-Itzhak, graduate student in physics.

Kennedy

City's Northwest Classen High School in 1983. At 6-5, Kennedy is rather small in comparison to other Big Eight forwards who usually stand 6-8 or taller.

That has never bothered the overachiever, who edged K-State's Norris Coleman for the conference rebounding title.

A certain arrogance and cockiness is a Sooner trademark both on and off the court. It started with Tisdale, who helped lead the team to three consecutive National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament berths and has been carried over by "Choo" and his 1986-87 version of "Billy (Tubbs) Ball."

The only problem is Oklahoma almost always backs up its self-assuredness with a victory.

"If you say it, you'd better go back it up," Kennedy said Sunday at the Big Eight's Preseason Press Day. "That's my philosophy. Like the (Oklahoma) football team, they say it and they go out and back it up.

"If you do say (you're going to go out and win), you've got to mean it."

Kennedy finds himself in a conference swamped with All-American candidates and possible nominees for the Big Eight Player of the Year award. Players such as Kansas' Danny Manning, Missouri's Derrick Chievous, Iowa State's Jeff Grayer and K-State's Coleman are poised to keep him away from any such awards.

With OU ranked in the top 10 of most preseason polls, it will be Kennedy's responsibility to help the Sooners' newcomers mesh. Kennedy said the team's season goals are to win the Big Eight and advance to the Final Four — something the team did not achieve under Tisdale's guidance.

"With all the new people we have this year, we are trying to work on our offense and get things together," Kennedy said.

No doubt, if that light at the end of the tunnel is a Final Four trip to New Orleans come March, the horse pulling the Sooner wagon will be the little giant Kennedy.

Sooners

rankings. But for this season, Tubbs has them all from which to choose.

Weapons, weapons, weapons. They might have to add an extra ball and extra basket on the Sooners' end of the court this season just to keep up with all the talent.

Yet, Tubbs insists on staying modest and he uses his team's 30-point drubbing at the hands of the Soviet National Team as evidence.

"I'll tell you, this team is hard to read," Tubbs said. "I think we'll be six or seven games into the season before we'll know how hungry this team is.

"That's the key question, 'How hungry is this team?' I would think they would be starving."

Feiffer

Also an author, film maker and playwright, Feiffer said he enjoys being an editorial cartoonist the most.

He said, however, that cartoonists are not regarded as serious people with serious careers.

"When you're a political cartoonist, people ask you 'if you're so good at what you do, why don't you go into something else?'" he said.

Feiffer said cartoonists are also perceived as having "gotten away with something" and "escaped growing up."

"Grown-ups gave up drawing cartoons when they were 11 or 12," he said.

The Pulitzer Prize that he received earlier this year was a "wonderful award," he said.

"I was convinced after 30 years (of being an editorial cartoonist) that I wouldn't win a Pulitzer," Feiffer said.

"I think they're playing catch-up," he said referring to the Pulitzer Prizes that have been awarded in the past few years.

"They're giving (Pulitzer Prizes) to weirdos like Jimmy Breslin," he said. "They finally reached this weirdo."

Feiffer said the most difficult cartoons for him to draw are non-political domestic situations.

"To look at the underlying events and see what they signify is hardest to do," he said.

Feiffer said he has enjoyed drawing cartoons of former presidents, but he anticipates the next president will not be as easy to portray as Reagan.

Feiffer first gained national fame in the 1960s for the cartoons he drew for Playboy magazine.

"It was hot stuff in the '60s because everybody read (Playboy)," he said.

budget."

Wefald's letter also said the reduction of the general revenue appropriation would amount to at least $1.6 million to $2.4 million, but Miller said that was an early estimate. Under one-third of the cut would come from University extension and research programs, Wefald wrote. However, the Veterinary Medical Center's reduction is separate, amounting to $120,000 to $180,000.

"The letter was to inform deans and department heads that if they expect some expenditures, they may want to wait to receive instructions before they expend out all their money," Miller said. "It was just to alert them that they should focus in on a 2.5-percent reduction of their general budget, but it may go higher than that."

Any definite budget reduction plans are "completely premature until we receive official notification" from the governor's office, Miller said.

Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, said any budget cuts would have a negative impact on the college, possibly reducing the number of student credit hours taken in its departments.

"We'll either not be able to hire temporary instructors or graduate teaching assistants for the spring semester," she said. "That means there'll be some reduced numbers of sections of courses."

If the budget reductions do occur, it will not be the first time the human ecology college has faced cuts. Declining enrollment in the University in the past few years has caused it, like the other colleges, to make cuts.

"We have absorbed over the last three years nearly $300,000 in budget cuts. There's no room left for flexibility," Stowe said.

Dean William Stamey of the College of Arts and Sciences said he fears changes will be forced in the spring semester's scheduling as a result of budget reductions. The college teaches the largest number of students in the University and provides lower-level course instruction for most of the other colleges.

"I don't know the magnitude of the cuts yet, but I'm concerned that if the magnitude is anything like the percentages I have heard, I don't know where we can (make reductions). The difficulty is finding any area to make cuts in this late in the year," Stamey said.

Most of the funds for this semester and the spring semester already are committed, he said. So far, none of the department heads in the college have volunteered to make cuts.

"If the cuts do happen, somebody's going to feel the pain. I'm not making a threat — this is what we'll have to do," Stamey said. "It's going to be difficult if we have to cut some courses after the students enroll. I certainly don't want to (eliminate courses). It will be painful."

David Byrne, dean of the College of Education, said he is considering possible plans, but needs more information on the extent of the budget reduction before making any definite moves.

"Whatever we're required to do, ultimately we'll do," Byrne said. "Truth is, budget cuts don't help anybody, so a reduction in resources always makes it more difficult to do your job."

University officials should receive further notification on budget reductions by today or Friday, Miller said.

Hayden

no substantial impact until April, 1988."

He said his transition team task force on taxation is studying the possible impact of the tax code changes.

Hayden also said there are entitlement funds that will not be affected by Wednesday's announcement because of legal obligations.

He said many school districts may not be affected severely this year due to reserve funds. But he added that the spend down of current reserves may cause problems in following years.

Hayden said similar action by the state in 1982, which called for budget cuts of 4 percent, had less of an actual impact on state agencies because they were spread throughout the entire fiscal year.

Reagan

have had two more that we were expecting."

Six Americans are being held in Lebanon by groups sympathetic to the Iranian government, and Reagan did not identify the two hostages he said would have been freed.

The 30 minute news conference was thoroughly dominated by the Iranian arms shipments, an issue that some of Reagan's closest aides conceded in advance threaten the president's credibility with the public.

It was more than 15 minutes into the session when the president was asked a question about another subject — in this case arms negotiations with the Soviet Union.

"I continue to be optimistic" about the possibility of having another summit with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, he said.

Since his news conference in Chicago last August:

—Reagan, after promising not to trade an alleged Soviet spy for a jailed Moscow correspondent, struck a deal with the Soviets that freed American journalist Nicholas Daniloff and a Soviet scientist accused of espionage.

—A hastily arranged U.S.-Soviet summit in Reykjavik, Iceland, produced numerous tentative Soviet concessions on nuclear weapons reductions but collapsed when Reagan refused to yield to Mikhail Gorbachev's demand that the United States restrict its strategic defense research to the laboratory. And while Reagan says he remains prepared to pick up where he left off with Gorbachev, the United States has pulled back from the pledges Reagan, the Soviets and top U.S. spokesmen said were on the bargaining table at Reykjavik.

—A storm of controversy, eclipsed for a time by other credibility questions, swirled around a Reagan-approved policy of "disinformation" designed to confuse, frighten and perhaps lead to the collapse of Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi. Secret government documents leaked to the press disclosed the existence of the program, but Reagan and other administration officials have insisted they did not intend to mislead the American news media and people as part of the campaign.

—The president spent a substantial amount of his time after his last news conference campaigning to preserve Republican control of the Senate.

Regents reject plan to revise K-State's goals

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents rejected a proposal that would have added the College of Education to the mission statement of K-State during its meeting Thursday.

Regents' staff members, under the direction of executive director Stan Koplik, drafted the mission statements to define the major areas of emphasis for each Regents' institution.

"The reason is that when describing characteristics of K-State, it is a land grant university," Koplik said. "I would not place education in the same descriptive measure as the other programs that are listed."

Programs listed under the heading "Anticipated Program Emphases" were drawn from the mission statements of each institution.

The degree programs of the K-State College of Education were not listed as a major thrust in the University's mission statement.

Regent Sandra L. McCullen said she understood the areas of emphasis were the ones to be disturbed the least.

"The (programs) to go first are the ones that are not part of their area of emphasis," said Regent William R. Roy.

David Byrne, dean of the College of Education, said he expected some possible cuts in programs, but was startled that they would be at K-State.

"To have this occur, I feel I've been rhetorically raped," Byrne said.

University representatives said the College of Education at K-State is the largest in the state and must be included as an emphasis.

Regent Norman Brandeberry said he thought a decision should be made regarding K-State's mission statement, but the group proceeded to review drafts for the other state institutions.

At the conclusion of the role and scope study reports, University President Jon Wefald asked the academic affairs committee to again consider the inclusion of education as a major thrust for K-State.

Regent Frank J. Becker indicated they were not prepared to make a decision. He directed the Regents'

Athletic fee topic of open discussion

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

If students do not want an athletic fee, then there should not be one, Athletic Director Larry Travis said Thursday.

"I certainly don't want to put an added tax on the students that they don't want," Travis said. "I'm not here asking for tax without representation. If the student body at Kansas State University says that they don't want a fee, then we certainly are not going to commit hari-kari."

Travis, with Athletic Fee Task Force members, answered students' questions in the Union during a panel discussion sponsored by Student Governing Association as part of SGA Week.

Travis said if the fee is voted down in a student referendum, he will not ask President Wefald to veto the referendum.

"Get that straight — we are not forcing a fee on anyone. If it fails referendum, we're not going to push for it," he said.

Travis said since he came to the University, he has tried to be "as open to the student body" as possible.

"I care about the student body, and I'm interested in their opinions," he said. "If this is something they don't want, I'm not going to go against the will of the people."

Travis said if the athletic fee proposal fails, the athletic department will have to work harder to increase ticket sales.

A marketing survey is currently underway to do just that, he said. The survey, run in conjunction with the marketing department, was sent to 400 randomly selected individuals. Questions asked concerned ticket price levels, night versus day games, weather factors and traveling distances.

"When we get it all together, we'll analyze the data and try to increase season ticket sales," Travis said.

The athletic department is trying to raise money in other ways as well, he said, listing such fundraisers as garage sales, Wildcat clubs and a possible celebrity golf tournament in Wichita next spring or summer.

"We're doing everything we can to try to raise money to help our program," he said.

"The athletic department needs student support," said Kelly Lamborn, task force member and senior in journalism and mass communications. "I think that's what it boils down to."

Low student attendance at athletic events is probably the reason the athletic fee issue came about in the first place, Lamborn said.

Travis said the failure of assessment of an athletic fee would not jeopardize K-State's status in the Big Eight Conference.

"The athletic fee would not have a lot to do with us remaining in the Big Eight Conference," he said. "The way we're going to maintain and prove our status in the Conference is to be competitive in football and basketball."

That is done by winning, he said.

"What we have to do to be successful is put people in KSU Stadium — that's where the larger revenues are generated."

The revenue generated from an athletic fee — $300,000 to $400,000 — would be used to fund non-revenue sports, Travis said. Those sports currently cost the department about $850,000 a year, or 16 percent of the total budget, he said.

"The fees would be used to make sure that those revenues don't fall. All we're trying to do is become more competitive in the non-revenue programs," he said.

The athletic department has been able to survive without a student fee, Travis said. "I just think it would help if we were able to generate some revenues to provide more scholarships and operational budgets for the non-revenue programs."

The department is currently "standing on hold" while it waits for the task force to gather information, Travis said.

So far, that information gathering has consisted of a study of the athletic department's 1985-86 budget and proposed 1986-87 budget, a study of students' financial situations and a study of other universities' athletic fees, said Chairman Doug Folk, junior in electrical engineering.

Areas the group is directing its research into now are the athletic department's marketing survey, a K-State demographic study and a KSU Foundation scholarship drive.

The plan is to come up with a recommendation for Senate in time to hold a student referendum during Senate elections in February.

Merchants discuss measures to avoid repeat disturbance

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

When the University of Kansas Jayhawks and K-State Wildcats compete on the gridiron in Manhattan next fall, hordes of fans may find themselves without a central postgame site.

Members of the Aggieville Merchants Association have announced they may recommend to the Manhattan City Commission closing Aggieville at some point in the day of the game to avoid a disturbance similar to that which occurred Oct. 18.

Jim Schottler, president of the association, said shutting down the business district is only one suggestion a committee formed to study possible solutions will present to the city commission in early December.

In a prepared statement provided by Bill Jacoby, executive director of the associations, University President Jon Wefald was quoted as saying, "We simply cannot have a repeat of this year's disturbance.

"When a celebration turns into a destructive event that attracts people whose sole purpose is to witness or participate in that destructive event, then it is time to take bold action," he said.

"I applaud the courage and leadership of the Aggieville Merchants Executive Committee," Wefald said.

Wefald also said he will ask William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, to work with the judicial branch of student government to establish a University policy to punish student violators.

Sutton said although the Judicial Council can only act after a violation has been committed, warnings of potential charges can serve as a deterrent.

"It can inform people ahead of time that they can be brought before

Senate passes student referendum, approves amended Aggieville bill

By DARLA RYAN
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate passed the Student Representation Enhancement Referendum bill Thursday night, calling for students to vote on how they want to be represented.

If the students vote "yes," Senate representation will be split between colleges and housing units.

During debate, Lee White, senior in journalism and mass communications and co-sponsor of the bill, said the legislation is necessary for true student representation.

"If the bill isn't passed, the students will think you don't consider them capable to make their own decision on how they'd like to be represented," he said.

Student Body President Steve Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, said he is considering vetoing the bill unless the bill's sponsors convince him otherwise.

He said one reason would be because Senate is based on academics, not living groups.

The bill is to be on the ballot during the Student Governing Association general election in February.

Senate also passed a bill recommending the closing of Aggieville businesses at some point on the day of the K-State-University of Kansas home football game next fall.

The bill, which passed by a vote of 38-4, also stated Senate will assist and support various agencies working to protect the properties, reputation and well-being of the University and the city.

Sonny Ballard, Aggieville merchant, said merchants would be against the bill as written.

"I guarantee if passed you'll have severe public relations problems with the Aggieville merchants that you don't need right now," he said. "The bill, as it is now, will not sit well with the merchants."

He said merchants would be against the bill as originally worded because it suggested Aggieville be closed for the entire day.

During discussion, the bill was amended to say "at some point" on the day of the game.

"We are not the ones to say when (Aggieville) should be closed," said Sally Traeger, Senate chairwoman and senior in marketing. "We don't want to hurt their trade."

Johnson said the bill is merely a suggestion to the merchants and city commission.

"We're doing this as a suggestion from the students," he said. "We want to tell them what we feel but that doesn't mean they have to pass it."

U.S. providing military training for guerrillas at undisclosed site

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States, as part of its effort to get aid to the Nicaraguan guerrillas, began military training for a small group of Contras at an undisclosed location earlier this month, administration sources said Thursday.

The training got under way about two weeks ago inside the United States following the refusal of several nations that border Nicaragua to allow training camps inside their borders, the sources said.

The officials, who insisted on anonymity, said the training operation was being conducted under strict conditions of secrecy and that class sizes were being kept deliberately small.

In a related development, a Pentagon spokesman agreed Thursday that the United States had reason to suspect that a new, more powerful type of air-defense missile had been provided to Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government by the Soviet Union.

The Associated Press reported on Tuesday that, based on intelligence assessments, SA-14 ground-to-air missiles had been delivered to Nicaragua. The sources said the new shoulder-fired missiles would further complicate attempts to resupply Contra guerrillas by air.

Spokesman Bob Sims said he was not in a position to "conclusively confirm" the delivery of SA-14's, "but there are indications of that."

Sims refused to discuss the issue of Contra training, noting only that Congress had approved the resumption of training and arms shipments by passing a $100 million aid package sought by President Reagan.

The administration sources also declined to disclose the location of the training site or discuss specifics of the training.

One official agreed that it was "fair to assume" the Contra guerrillas were receiving instruction in the use of specific weapons as well as on war-fighting tactics and leadership. But this source added that this did not mean U.S. military personnel were dispensing the training.

The instructors could just as easily be drawn from outside contractors or the Central Intelligence Agency, the official said.

Khomeini faults negotiation efforts

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran's revolutionary leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini on Thursday ruled out reconciliation with Washington and said any Iranian officials who seek to improve relations are "Satan-oriented."

"I never expected such things from these people," Khomeini, 86, said in a speech at his residence in north Tehran. His remarks were broadcast by Tehran radio and monitored in Nicosia.

"This is a time when they should be screaming at America. (But) they are shouting at themselves," Khomeini said in his first public comment on contacts between Washington and Tehran.

He also urged unity within Iran's revolutionary leadership, in which Western observers recently have reported deep divisions.

Without mentioning names, Khomeini criticized Iranian leaders who publicly have demonstrated flexibility towards the United States in recent weeks. He accused them of falling prey to propaganda from the White House, which he called the "Black House."

Funeral draws 100,000 protesters

MANILA, Philippines — More than 100,000 people joined the funeral procession of slain labor leader Rolando Olalia on Thursday in the biggest display by the political left since a communist rebellion began 17 years ago.

At a stop about 500 yards from President Corazon Aquino's office in Malacanang Palace, speakers urged her to use the left in confronting rightist challenges from Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile or loyalists of former President Ferdinand E. Marcos, who fled the country last February.

Enrile, who also was defense minister under Marcos, has been outspoken in criticizing government policy. Rumors of coup plots by his supporter the army have filled the city.

About 50,000 people followed a truck carrying the caskets of Olalia, 52, and his driver, Leonor Alay-ay, in a day-long procession that was largely peaceful. It wound for 12 miles from suburbs to the downtown district.

Mistaken call leads to drug bust

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — An apparently mistaken call to the 911 emergency line in Kansas City Thursday led police to a house where they found a major drug operation.

The people inside the house fled and left behind an estimated $175,000 worth of narcotics and $12,600 in cash.

"It was unbelievable," Officer Daniel Sweetwood said. "There's an old saying that police work is a lot of luck. That's what this was."

Police said a call — apparently a misdial by someone trying to place a long-distance call — was received on the 911 emergency line from the house early Thursday morning. The caller hung up without speaking.

But the 911 equipment gave police the address of the house where the call originated. Following routine procedure, a dispatcher sent two cars to the address, but officers were told no one had called the emergency number. The officers said a man and two women ran away, but the women were captured after a two-block chase.

Officers found a drug cache of 1.25 pounds of powdered cocaine; 1,153 half-gram packets of crack, a crystallized form of cocaine; 200 grams of crack that was being packaged; two handguns, and the cash.

Leaders brand Iran sale 'mistake'

WASHINGTON — Congressional leaders on Thursday brushed aside President Reagan's defense of his secret sale of arms to Iran, branding it a "mistake" that may very well have violated the law.

As two congressional committees prepared for closed door sessions with CIA Director William Casey, Republicans and Democrats used nearly identical terms to criticize the president's actions.

Reagan met with the House Democratic and GOP leaders at the White House but had nothing further to say publicly, following a Wednesday night news conference in which he defended the sales as a "high-risk gamble" that at least gained the release of three American hostages.

Reagan's former national security adviser Robert McFarlane, who delivered a planeload of weapons to Iran, issued a statement taking responsibility for "a serious error in judgment" in not realizing that the sale would have a damaging effect on the national interest.

"The bottom line is that we should not even have a perception of trading arms for hostages," said Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan.. Dole said the policy was "a mistake" — echoing Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., who declared Reagan "made a mistake and he ought to say so and get this behind him."

FAA orders inspection of 100 jets

WASHINGTON — The Federal Aviation Administration ordered airlines Thursday to inspect nearly 100 Lockheed L-1011 jetliners for possible cracking in the wing after a fracture was found in one of the Delta Air Lines wide-body jets.

The FAA action was taken after the National Transportation Safety Board, investigating the Delta incident, raised concern about possible metal fatigue in the wing support beams of the L-1011 jets and urged an "immediate inspection" of the planes.

The FAA directive requires inspection within 50 flying hours, or about a week, of the wing supports, or spars, on the wide-body jets if they have had at least 10,000 takeoffs and landings, said agency spokesman Fred Farrar.

There are about 112 of the Lockheed L-1011s being flown by U.S. airlines and almost all of them are owned by Delta, Eastern Airlines and Trans World Airlines. At least 93 of the planes would likely fall under the inspection provision, officials said.

Income affects health of rich, poor

DALLAS — When doctors' average annual income declines, their blood pressure goes up and stays high for as long as five years, according to a new study that shows it's not just poor people whose health is affected by economic status.

The finding, in a professional group with an average annual income of $108,000 in 1984, parallels findings previously made in blue-collar workers, said Robert Swank, an economist from Johns Hopkins Medical School in Baltimore.

He presented his findings Thursday at the annual meeting of the American Heart Association.

"There are not many decreases in income among physicians, so their hypertension is fairly low," Swank said in an interview.

But the national average of doctors' incomes did decline in six separate years since World War II, he said.

For each 1 percent drop in income, the number of doctors with elevated blood pressure rose 2.5 percent the next year. "The association is strong," Swank said.

He counted only those cases of high blood pressure serious enough to require medication.

Most dominant fall season illness just common cold, doctor says

By KELLI CARR
Collegian Reporter

Although it's little consolation to those who have battled such illnesses as strep throat or whooping cough this fall, a physician at Lafene Student Health Center said the most common affliction has been the common cold.

"A few cases of strep throat have been reported, but the majority of cases treated have been the common cold," said Dr. Thomas Ryan.

He said most illnesses such as colds and flu are not passed through the air as many people believe. Most viruses are passed by hand to hand contact.

For instance, when someone sneezes, he puts his hand to his nose, spreading the virus to the hand. Whatever he touches then becomes contaminated with the virus. The next person who touches the contaminated area picks up the virus, possibly infecting himself or others he touches.

"The most effective prevention of becoming infected with upper-respiratory infections is frequently washing the hands," Ryan said.

'The most effective prevention...is frequently washing the hands.'
—Dr. Thomas Ryan

Some symptoms of the cold are a stuffy or runny nose, fever, body aches and pains, scratchy cough, sore throat and a general feeling of fatigue. Ryan said most over-the-counter medications can be used to help treat symptoms of cold and flu viruses. However, he recommends that one medication be taken to treat all symptoms instead of several medications to treat several symptoms.

"In the event that the person taking the medication has an allergic reaction to a medication, it is easier to determine which one caused the problem when only one or a few are taken at once as opposed to several," Ryan said.

He said a cold and other similar viruses generally last from seven to 14 days. A physician should be consulted if symptoms of colds or flu linger more than 14 days, or if symptoms seem to disappear for a week or so and then reappear.

If symptoms of a cold seem to localize in one area, or if a fever and stuffy nose disappear and the cough lingers, it is suggested a physician be contacted because a bacteria could be forming, Ryan said.

He said a few cases of whooping cough were treated at the beginning of the semester, but no evidence of other cases has been found at Lafene.

Also, other illnesses that have been diagnosed among students include bronchitis and tonsillitis. Mononucleosis has been reported in a few instances, Ryan said.

Communications operations merge to form new extension department

By MARTA MONTGOMERY
Collegian Reporter

The merging of K-State's Department of Extension Radio-Television-Film and the Department of Extension Information resulted in the new Department of Extension Communications, now operating under one administrative head.

The department is responsible for preparation of news and feature articles for newspapers and farm magazines. It develops popular extension publications and operates an instructional media center and computer graphics lab.

Jack Burke, head of the Department of Extension Communications, said the department disseminates information dealing with marketing ideas, crops, livestock and home economics. They deliver information on "what's going on and upcoming events."

The Extension communications department has assumed all of the responsibilities of the two former departments.

In the past, the Department of Extension Radio-TV-Film operated the radio station KKSU and the K-State radio network. Burke said it also worked on television projects and video tapes.

The former Department of Extension Information was responsible for the print media, including issuing news releases and press releases, operating an instructional media center and a duplicating center.

He said there was not a problem of duplicating work when the departments were separate because each was dealing with different media. However, now that they are combined, work can be done more efficiently.

"Now we have the ability to pull our resources together and cooperate," he said. As one department, the faculty is able to share story ideas and combine all its efforts into the major media campaigns.

Extension Director Fred Sobering said the merger will "improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the faculty and staff that provide communications support for the Cooperative Extension Service."

Burke, former head of the Department of Extension Radio-TV-Film, has also been acting as temporary head of Extension Information since the departure of Gary Vacin in midsummer.

The merger became official Oct. 24, when it was approved by the Board of Regents. The two departments merged as soon as they received official word.

'Live' Springsteen album placates fans

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Ever since he started recording in 1973, fans of Bruce Springsteen have pleaded for a live album. They knew what most of America has only come to realize in the past two years — Bruce Springsteen is one of the greatest live performers in the history of rock 'n' roll.

At last their wait is over. "Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band Live/1975-85," a five-record boxed set, has arrived. By no means is this one of those obligatory live sets by performers just trying to pull in a few quick bucks. This album reaches back across the breadth of his career (back as far as 1975 anyway), showing Springsteen and the E Street Band performing sometimes startlingly different versions of his songs.

"Thunder Road," the only song actually recorded as far back as 1975, is little like the studio version on the "Born to Run" album. Here, the arrangement is stark — simply vocals and piano. A similar approach is taken on "No Surrender" from the "Born in the U.S.A." album. While playing acoustic guitar, Springsteen slows the tempo until the song becomes a beautiful reminiscence.

But also included here are live versions of songs that have never appeared on any Springsteen album. The first of these, "Paradise by the 'C,'" is a rousing instrumental, dating back to the 1978 "Darkness On the Edge of Town" Tour. To really appreciate the song, it's necessary to see it performed live. The song depends just as much upon the choreographed antics of the band as it does upon the excellent work of Clarence Clemons on saxophone.

Two other previously unavailable Springsteen songs — "Fire" and "Because the Night" — date back as far as "Paradise." Both songs have been recorded by other performers. "Fire" was recorded first by Robert Gordon, and later by the Pointer Sisters. Springsteen's version is much more playful and energetic than either previous version. But the real showstopper is "Because the Night" (which Patti Smith turned into a top 10 single in 1978). This time the mood is ominous as the song builds to a crushing climax (although I'm certain I've heard an even more powerful live version of this same song).

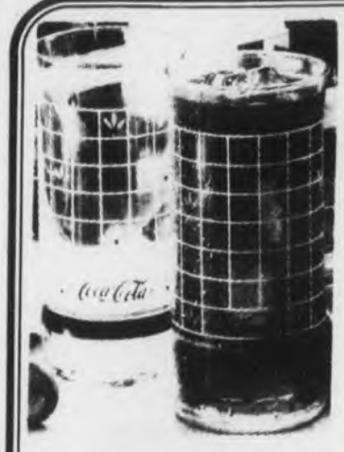
The most recent of the Springsteen-penned, previously unavailable songs is a roadhouse rocker called "Seeds."

Some of the best moments on the album come when Springsteen isn't singing, but instead is telling autobiographical stories. Back in the '70s he used to tell several of these stories every concert. They became just as much a part of his concerts as the music itself. "Live 1975-85" contains only two of these stories, but they're two of his best.

The first story he tells in the middle of the song "Growin' Up" (recorded in 1978). It's a comical story about his parents, who used to tell him, "You know it's not too late. You can still go back to college." The other story, which he tells before "The River," is a poignant tale of his arguments with his father about the length of his hair. These stories hint what it was like when his concerts were more intimate, before he began playing stadiums.

But possibly the highlight of the album is Springsteen's version of Woody Guthrie's "This Land is Your Land" — a natural choice for him after his "Nebraska" album. He gives new depth to the song for those people who think it's just a patriotic ode.

Even though this album is more than 3 hours and 20 minutes long, and contains 40 songs, some songs are curiously missing. One of these is Springsteen's electrifying live version of "Prove it all Night," which bares little resemblance to the studio version on "Darkness of the Edge of Town." Also missing is "Not Fade Away/She's the One" — one of his very best live songs. But most conspicuously absent is his cover version of Gary U.S. Bonds' "Quarter to Three." This song used to close every concert.



It's easy to get picky over what songs are included here — we all have our favorite Springsteen songs — but do we really need live versions of eight songs from "Born in the U.S.A.," especially since most of these are virtuallly identical to the studio versions?

But this album must satisfy the new fans along with the old ones, and on those terms the album is nearly everything we could hope for. It's not the greatest live album ever released, but it's certainly one of the best.

FFA should establish pilot health standard

One man may be responsible for a major airline crash, and he is not a pilot, mechanic or air traffic controller. His job is to recertify professional pilots and co-pilots.

More than 250 people with potentially fatal or debilitating medical conditions have been recertified by Frank Austin, over the objections of medical experts. Austin, who has the final say in most appeals of medical decisions, has been criticized for his dangerous and reckless actions, which could pose a serious threat to the safety of thousands, both in the air and on the ground.

His decisions led to the deaths of two people, one a pilot who suffered a heart attack which caused him to crash his helicopter. More than a year before the accident, a Federal Aviation Administration medical examiner declared that the pilot's heart was too diseased for him to continue flying.

If Austin continues to work in this capacity using his current standards of judgment, an entire plane full of people could be lost because of a pilot whose poor medical condition overtakes his ability to safely fly the plane. And even more lives could be endangered on the ground should the plane crash into a heavily-populated area.

The FAA needs to be assured that only the most qualified pilots, both technically and physically, will be certified. In light of recent concerns for aviation regulation and the need for policies, the FAA can start with recertification standards.

By looking at Austin's record of going over the heads of experts in the medical field and certifying those with physical problems that could lead to disaster, it is clear policies need to be set in this area.

The FAA must decide if it is willing to take responsibility for a fatal crash caused by one man's belief that pilots with serious medical problems will be safe in the skies.

People use isolation in self-defense

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

If I were still a photographer (not that I was so great in the first place), I would do a series of photos and title it "A Study in Isolation."

It would be a visualization of how we isolate ourselves from the others of our species.

It might take the form of pictures from other countries to show how, at times, we in the United States isolate ourselves from the rest of the world — how we think and act as if we were better than the rest of the people on Earth.

Of course, there is always the opposite — how we stick our noses into another country's business with no regard for the consequences. But that's another column.

Those same shots might show how the world is divided by borders, by cultures, by economics, by religion and so on.

The study in isolation might take the form of conflicts, for example, war photographs — showing the pain, the blood and the horror of how we attempt to solve international or national strife — or shots of sporting events where two teams attempt to play at war without the bloodshed. (At least it's supposed to be without blood.)

An excellent example of a one-on-one conflict would be a picture of the end of a boxing match, when the opponents are so tired and bloody they have no idea what they were fighting for or about. A shot of opposing football lines going head-to-head might illustrate the idea of conflict and the eternal idea of one team (race, country, etc., you fill in the blank) being better than the other.

Another illustration of isolation would be to show poverty, whether in the United States or another country. We isolate ourselves by country and by economics. We poor college students understand this, although we aren't as poor as most in the world. The idea of economic superiority has isolated many a person and many a group.

One form of isolation I'm guilty of is withdrawing. One picture that is perfect to illustrate isolation is a person walking with a headset on listening to something other than the sounds of the world. I do this, sometimes with unfavorable results.

We plug in and tune out. It's a phenomenon of our culture. Portable radios and cassette players are a major cause of isolation, particularly among college students. How many times have you tried to attract the attention of a friend when that person was plugged in? How many times have you tried to carry on a conversation with someone tuned into — and feeling the beat — of a hard rock group? It's impossible.

We also isolate ourselves by the way we react and respond to those around us. We have a terrible habit of misconstruing what another says or does.

One of us will say something and the other person takes it in a different manner than intended. We are masters at misunderstanding others. We do not communicate what or how we are feeling, or how we view the rest of the world. We assume — and the key word is "assume" — the other person knows how we feel or what we are thinking. And most of the time this is not the case.

Other people cannot and do not know what we are thinking; telepathy is still not part of our society and probably never will be.

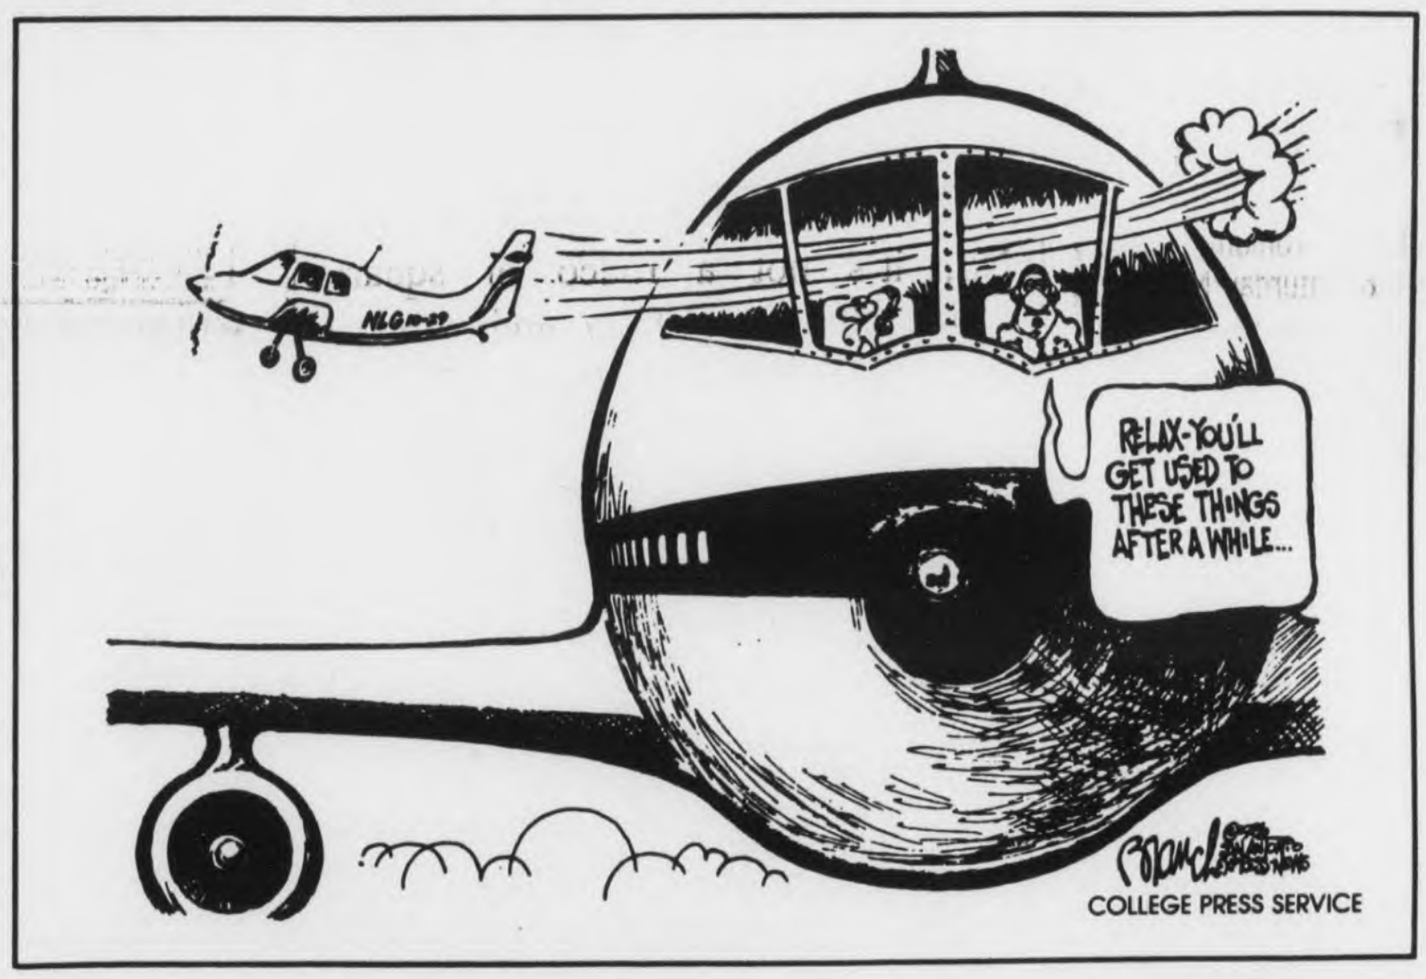
So why do we isolate ourselves, either through mechanical means or by misunderstandings?

It varies from person to person, but in most cases it is in the name of self-preservation.

We do it to protect ourselves from hurt. We do not risk the pain that comes with close and communicative relationships. We fail to understand others because we do not wish to understand and, in understanding, put ourselves in the position of needing to feel and possibly be hurt. The sense of self-preservation is just too strong.

It may be we have never allowed someone to become close so we have no idea of the joy and happiness a relationship can bring. I use "relationship" to mean not only a male/female relationship, but also to mean friendship between the two sexes or between members of the same sex.

It may be we have never allowed ourselves to include another person in our lives, even family. It may be we have allowed someone into our lives before and that person did not live up to our expectations or in some other way caused pain.



Whatever the reason, we isolate ourselves. We fail to allow other people the luxury of knowing who we really are. We fail to allow ourselves the luxury of having someone know us as well or better than we know ourselves.

A friend recently asked me if having someone be able to read me like a book bothered me. She was referring to an old friend who knows me almost better than I know myself. I truthfully answered that I like it. It was and is comforting to know there is someone whom I can turn to, no matter what the circumstances. This friend is the one person I can tell everything to, the person I consider to be the best friend I have.

We have our differences but we still are able to read each other very well, to know when and if things are causing the other person problems. We can talk about everything under the sun. It's too bad we have so many miles between us. It's difficult carrying on the long discussions over the phone.

I realize we humans have a strong and undeniable instinct to save ourselves. We do it unconsciously and effortlessly. We do not realize what we are doing or why, but we do it. We protect ourselves, our individualism, and our very essence as human beings.

It's not too much fun to be isolated from the rest of the human race. It's something we as a race and as individuals need to work on. But then, it's probably one of our unique qualities (and talents?) as humans.

Letters

On grades, cheating

Editor,

Re: Justin Hockersmith's letter, "Pledges' grades count," and Nicholas Hrencher's letter, "Student cheaters bad," in Friday's Collegian.

In response to Hockersmith's letter concerning instructor response to grade requests, as an instructor who makes an effort to acknowledge any student request, I felt offended. Most instructors have many requests made on them daily. It would be nice for any student making such a request to do it formally. Provide a written request stating what is desired. It is a student's right to know his grade, no doubt about that. But realize that grade reporting takes considerable time and consideration to compile.

My second response is to Hrencher's letter, "Student cheaters bad." I agree. Those students who cheat not only cheat themselves, they cheat other honest students. I personally take precautions to prevent cheating, but it is sad that instructors even have to worry about it. We may not all be the best students or achieve the highest grades, but I respect an individual who can say, "I was not prepared and accept a low grade," vs. someone who cheats. It certainly takes more courage and integrity. It is a student's responsibility to not cheat and I feel sorry for anyone who can live with himself who does cheat. But most of all, I regret the situation of honest students put at a disadvantage by cheaters.

President's terrorism

Editor,

Re: Rande Repp's letter, "Positive on Reagan," in Wednesday's Collegian.

I wish to address Repp's examples of positive things President Reagan has done, mainly Grenada and his responses to terrorism. In the case of Grenada, Reagan justifies the assault by saying the Cubans were building an airstrip with military capabilities. It was only after the invasion that the American public learned that our allies, not the Cubans, were behind this project which was designed for commercial aircraft so they might increase their tourist trade. Instead of acting like a civilized nation and using diplomacy, the United States acted more like imperialist England in the 17th century (and that's nothing to be proud of).

Before I begin on Reagan's responses to terrorism, it is necessary to define terrorism: "A violent action by an individual or individuals against innocent people designed to achieve political objectives." Reagan ordered a military strike against Libya because they were training and supporting terrorists. Reagan first tells the American public he has concrete evidence of this, then later word was leaked that it was all just a disinformation campaign. In this instance, Reagan wasn't waiting for the "right time to go public." He just lied to his constituency and the world right from the beginning.

One shouldn't mistake Reagan as someone who is truly opposed to terrorism, because he is not. A prime case of his support of terrorism is the contras. They fit the definition of terrorists — you never hear of them engaging the Sandinista army; it's always ambushing workers in the fields or blowing up vehicles carrying civilian women and children. The United States is training and supporting this terrorist organization in open defiance of the World Court. According to Reagan's doctrine (the one he applied to Libya), France, Switzerland, Mexico and many other nations would be justified to attack the United States because we trained and armed the terrorists who killed the innocent civilians from those nations.

I could include more, like our training and support of terrorists in Angola, and the latest Iranian arms shipment fiasco (but Reagan says we don't deal with terrorists?). I hope Repp watched the presidential address Wednesday night. It supplies one with all the evidence of just how competent our president is. (Reagan should have pleaded the Fifth Amendment).

Reagan cover-ups

Editor,

Re: Rande Repp's letter, "Positive on Reagan," in Wednesday's Collegian.

Repp's statements on the nature of the American political process and the press's responsibility would be almost brilliant, if they were accurate reflections of these entities' interactions and the duty the American electorate has in discerning among these two sources of information. The truth is he did not hit the "nail on the head" in any of the categories.

His observation as to the "tainting the truth" by our "beloved" president is almost correct, however, covering up the truth through disinformation schemes tends to the norm for Reagan in most cases during his presidency. In the recent case of arms sales to Iran, assuming no connection between the sales and the release of the American hostages in Lebanon is a fine example of this policy. If you believe this bit of Reagan rhetoric, you are very naive.

The importance of this case is great; if the scenario Repp purports were the real case, then Reagan should be applauded. However, Reagan circumvented the traditional political process of consultation by not forewarning either the secretary of state or defense of his actions, thus rendering obsolete the cabinet and Congress' role in the American political process. It is for this reason that we should not allow American elected officials endless policy domain.

The press' role in all of this is to be objective; when press coverage is not objective, Repp always has the right to write an editorial aimed directly at the source, as he did in the case of Kirk Caraway's article.

Finally, may I remind Repp that John Wayne is dead and that the traditional American way may not be very viable anymore without a little bit of dynamic change.

Magical methods for pre-enrolling

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

I went through pre-enrollment yesterday, something that always strikes me as a tease this time of year. Here I am sweating over six finals and four term papers, and I'm supposed to think about a fresh semester when I will study regularly, not pull all-nighters and start on those term papers early.

Funny how I've come to regard pre-enrollment as an event rather than an action, treating the semester ritual as a harrowing noun to be overcome, rather than a brief verb one does in an afternoon. I never say, "I'm pre-enrolling" — with a Mary Tyler Moore smile — but rather, "I'm going through pre-enrollment" — with a Lou Grant grimace — like one says "I'm going through puberty" or "I'm going through pledge initiation."

I had a bit of trouble with enrollment last semester because I didn't arrive in the United States until late July, and so had to go through late enrollment — you know, in August after the freshmen have enrolled. This left open to me a wonderful selection of classes including GRMN 666 — Progressive German Political Thought of Konrad Adenauer, and ECON 962 — Micro-economic Analysis of the North Dakota Salmon Industry.

In general, seniors have it easy when enrollment time rolls around as they enroll first and most of their classes are so specialized they never fill up anyway. Enrollment priority is one of those benefits that comes after you really need it, such as becoming old enough to buy alcohol after you graduate from high school, or earning a high income after you graduate from college.

Things weren't so easy my freshman and sophomore years. Being an arts and sciences student, I enjoyed an especially large number of those "general" classes like General Chemistry, General Physics, College Algebra and Economics I. The fight to get into all these classes and still not have to be on campus until 11:30 a.m. wasn't an easy one.

I picture the whole process starting with the Collegian. The paper gradually begins adding extra pages as the closed classes list increases. Then, longer and longer lines begin appearing on the stairs in Farrell Library. I laughed at those people the first time I saw the line until someone told me that, as a freshman, I would be standing in the longest line.

I soon found myself on the fourth-floor landing at Farrell, trying to work out my schedule as I moved down the stairs. In front of me was a girl with thick, black-framed glasses and a Hewlett-Packard computer in her front shirt pocket. I asked to see her schedule to get some class ideas — Accelerated Calculus, Accelerated Chemistry, Engineering Physics I and Latin. No ideas for me there, though I had a fascinating discussion concerning her 12th level magic user and a staff of wonderous power.

Next, I met a guy with Hawaiian shorts who looked a little more laid back. His schedule read, Music Listening Lab, Concepts of P.E., Tennis 4, Weight Training, Oral Communications and Intermediate Multiplication and Division. From him, I began to understand there are certain strategies behind class selection. He explained his: "I try to enroll in a solid 12 hours and then cut back when the load interferes with my lifestyle." Now that's laid back.

Wanting to graduate in the 1980s, however, I moved on and by the time I got to the bottom of the stairs, I'd changed my major twice and my brand of Christianity three times. Now I discovered the true logic of the pre-enrollment system. Just as I prepared to hand over my form, I passed by the new listings of closed classes. "Why weren't these on the fourth-floor landing?" I complained, and the hurried rush between the bulletin boards and the computers began.

I finally arrived at the computer, foolishly full of confidence that this nightmare was about over. Little did I realize that Dan Owens was about to meet the world of computers. My number was typed in the computer, seconds passed, then the lady stared up at me in disbelief. She shook her head and asked, "Do you realize if you pay off your library fines they'll probably name the new basketball coliseum after you?"

Now I'm a senior, the lines are much shorter, and I've a few strategies of my own. One soon learns that a good GPA is as much a product of clever enrollment strategies as it is course work. Remember that you can have any class you want anytime it is offered (with the exception of certain science labs) if you know how to go about it.

The main thing to remember is that, while there is a deadline to drop classes, you can add a class as late in the semester as you want. Thus, if a class if full, just go to it, get a good grade on the first test and add it when some of the chumps in Hawaiian shorts drop out. Of course, if no one drops out, you may end up licking your instuctor's feet to get a note allowing enrollment.

Perhaps I should conclude before I give away all my secrets. I do still have to enroll again next spring and you never know who might be reading this column. Good pre-enrollers like good magicians (often the two are indiscernible) should never give away their secrets.

Ombudsman to talk about mediator role

By MARY LYNN GATSCHET
Collegian Reporter

The University of Kansas' ombudsman is scheduled to speak about his role as campus mediator today in response to interest in creating the position at K-State.

Robert Shelton, professor of religious studies and communications studies at KU, will give his presentation at 3:45 p.m. in Seaton 132.

An ombudsman serves the academic community by attempting to reconcile problems brought from students or faculty concerning almost anything that can arise in a university environment.

The idea of hiring a K-State ombudsman has been proposed to Faculty Senate, said Jack Lambert, professor of chemistry and Faculty Senate member.

Representatives of the American Association of University Professors approached University President Jon Wefald on the matter also. Lambert said Wefald was "very receptive."

Shelton said his role as campus ombudsman is "to deal with conflicts with people whose problems have not been taken care of by anyone through normal (university) channels."

Shelton said this may concern any number of circumstances. A student may have a problem in the housing department or with a particular professor. In faculty cases, he said conflicts may arise between faculty and department heads.

In any case, Shelton said he usually does not act as an arbitrator, but rather he offers counsel based on the individual circumstances and university policies.

Shelton's presentation is being sponsored jointly by the KSU chapter of AAUP and by the Faculty Affairs Committee of Faculty Senate.

One reason the organizations are interested in creating an ombudsman office is to solve campus problems in a less formal manner than filing a complaint with the University Grievance Board.

"The role would help anyone who wants to know how they stand and what the rules are," Lambert said.

Doris Grosh, professor of industrial engineering and Faculty Senate member, described the formal grievance procedures as "quite drastic" and "somewhat confrontive."

She said Faculty Senate hopes a university ombudsman would be able to "settle disputes and dissatifactions by having an outsider come in and settle them" without using the more serious means of the grievance board.

Credit transfer subject of ASK survey

By The Collegian Staff

Due to problems with credit hour transfers at both the state's universities and community colleges, Associated Students of Kansas is conducting a statewide survey to identify the problems students are having.

The difficulty at present, Patty Hipsher, senior in political science and ASK campus director said, is in determining credit transfers from an institution governed by the Board of Regents to a community college, and, from one Regents institution to another.

Students seldom know in advance how much of their work will transfer, Hipsher said.

"You usually can't find out until you transfer, walk into the administration office, and say, 'These are the courses I have taken. Which ones will transfer?'" she said.

Hipsher said ASK has decided on two courses of action.

First, she said, the association wants to develop plans that will aid students needing to have credit transferred. This aid, she said, might come in the form of a guidebook for students explaining which courses will transfer to which universities.

Secondly, she said, ASK wants to form proposals to remove the non-uniformity of credit transfers.

From the survey, which is being conducted at each of the Regents' schools, Hipsher said ASK hopes to draw some general conclusions about the problems transfer students face.

The survey consists of a two-page questionnaire which was given to transfer students by members of the Student Senate and the president of Transfer Student Honorary.

The results are to be tabulated Nov. 28 and presented to the Council of Chief Academic Officers Dec. 1 in Topeka.

Questions included follow:

— Did you encounter difficulty in transferring credits to satisfy general education requirements?

— Did you encounter difficulty in transferring credits to satisfy requirements in a major?

— Did you have courses at your previous institution that you believed would be equivalent to courses at your current university that did not transfer?

You might be asking yourself
What is Circle K?
No, it's not a rodeo or square dance club, a country and western bar, or a breakfast cereal. It's not even a dog food. It's a service organization for college men and women that's affiliated with the Kiwanis Club. Want more details? Come to our meeting Sunday night at 8 p.m., in Union 207.

SPECIAL KSU/CU BUFFET & HOURS!

AT VALENTINO'S BUFFET, THERE'S NO PENALTY FOR PILING ON!

K-State enters Colorado game with new QB

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Coach Stan Parrish has no doubts that his football squad will be facing a motivated Colorado Buffaloes team Saturday afternoon at KSU Stadium.

By defeating the Wildcats, Colorado has a shot at both a share of the Big Eight title and a bowl bid. A Buffaloes' victory coupled with a Nebraska victory over Oklahoma Saturday would leave those teams in a three-way tie atop the league with 6-1 conference marks.

Colorado has won five of its last six contests, its only loss in that span being a 28-0 defeat to Oklahoma last Saturday. Colorado, which began the year with high expectations under fifth-year head coach Bill McCartney after a 7-4 campaign and a Freedom Bowl appearance in 1985, opened the year by dropping all four non-conference matches.

"I'm expecting them to be up," Parrish said. "Any team that was 0-4 and is now 5-5, if you think they aren't going to play hard, then you better get out of coaching."

The Wildcats, 2-8 on the year and 1-5 in the conference, are coming off a 48-19 loss at the hands of the Iowa State Cyclones. The two bright spots which did emerge for the Wildcats in the setback — the rushing performance of junior tailback Tony Jordan, and the quarterback play of junior Tim Hanson — will be counted on heavily Saturday.

Jordan set a school single-game rushing mark with his 218-yard performance Saturday. Hanson, who came in for starting quarterback Randy Williams after the first play from scrimmage, threw for 161 yards on only nine attempts. Williams subsequently left the team, and Hanson has stepped in at the starting position.

"I've been pleased with Tim's work in practice all week, and Colorado presents the chance to throw the ball a little bit, too. So we're going to have a balanced attack against them," Parrish said.

The Buffaloes rely on a well-balanced wishbone attack on offense, which is keyed by junior quarterback Mark Hatcher. Colorado ranks 16th nationally in rushing offense, averaging more than 235 yards per game.

Two key elements of that wishbone, Hatcher and starting running back Anthony Weatherspoon, found themselves in the midst of a controversy last week when both admitted, along with two other squad members, to having used cocaine.

Parrish said the key to stopping Colorado's wishbone attack is the Buffaloes themselves.

"The thing that stops the wishbone is them — bad pitches, fumbles — because it's a real high-risk offense," he said.

On the other side of the ball, the Buffs field a stingy defense led by senior linebacker Barry Remington, who leads the team with 120 tackles, and mammoth 6-foot-8 defensive tackle Curt Koch, who has eight sacks on the year.

McCartney said his Buffaloes are ready for Saturday's 1:30 p.m. kickoff.

"We have reason to be excited this week. If we win in Manhattan and Nebraska wins, we'll have a share of the Big Eight title. That would be a heck of a year for us, but we'll have to be prepared to play. We have a lot on the line this week," McCartney said.

Parrish up for Purdue job

By The Collegian Staff

The Des Moines Register recently reported that an "unnamed Purdue source" said K-State's football coach Stan Parrish was one candidate for the head coaching position at Purdue University in Lafayette, Ind.

Parrish, when contacted by the Collegian, denied any knowledge of the alleged candidacy.

"I don't know anything about that (story)," Parrish said. "Nothing whatsoever."

Purdue coach Leon Burtnett announced his resignation Nov. 6 which will become effective when the Boilermakers conclude the 1986 campaign. Purdue, 2-8, is tied for ninth in the Big Ten race going into Saturday's game against Indiana.

In a prepared statement, Burtnett said, "I'm resigning for two very important reasons — my family and my team. These are my ultimate concerns."

Burtnett is in his fifth year at Purdue and has compiled a 20-34-1 record.

According to the sports information office at Purdue, Athletic Director George King has not set a timetable for hiring a new coach.

Tournament offers hope for Wildcats

By DAVE WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

The K-State volleyball team is approaching this weekend's Big Eight Volleyball Championships as a fresh start.

The tournament, at Penn Valley Community College in Kansas City, Mo., is giving the Wildcats a chance to forget the woes of their 12-16 regular season record and their 2-8 conference mark.

"We're moving on from our regular season play and concentrating on the championship tournament. The girls have had a good week of practice and that is usually an indicator of how they will do in upcoming competition," Coach Scott Nelson said after the Wildcats' disappointing season on the court which left them ranked sixth of seven teams.

Rankings don't bother Nelson, though.

"The way we are ranked is based on our record going into the tournament. It really isn't an indicator of how we will do. We feel confident that we'll play better than our ranking might indicate," Nelson said.

In the team's opener at 8 tonight, it will face third-ranked Kansas, a match-up which Nelson feels good about.

"We know the Kansas team well, and that is a real advantage for us. In the matches we've had with them this year, it has always been close (in points and games played per match)," Nelson said.

Leading the team into the tourney is sophomore Shawnee Call. Call has proved her playing and leadership abilities time and time again this season as she leads the Big Eight in kills, with 108, and ranks second in digs, with 108.

Nelson hopes to surprise a few people at the tournament this weekend. He is looking for consistent play from Call, along with strong supporting roles from Mary Mignano, Valerie Kastens, Helen Bundy and last week's Big Eight Player of the Week nominee Cindy Durham, who have all been playing solidly this season.

Solid play is what the team will need to avenge last year's upset in the first-round of play at the championship tournament. The sixth-ranked Iowa State Cyclones defeated the third-ranked K-State team, sending them home much earlier than expected. Nelson would like to turn the tables this year in the opening game with Kansas.

Other first-round action in the tourney includes seventh-ranked Colorado facing second-ranked Oklahoma and fifth-ranked Missouri meeting fourth-ranked Iowa State.

Mitch Richmond and the rest of the K-State basketball squad will suit up Saturday night for an intra-squad scrimmage in Ahearn Field House, following the All Seasons Alumni Classic. The alumni event will feature nearly 20 stars from the past.

Scrimmage brings back alumni basketball stars

K-STATE

Last Season's Record:
16-14/4-10 (7th in conference)
Collegian's Projected Finish: 4th
Projected All-Big Eight Performers:
Norris Coleman (First Team)
Mitch Richmond (Second Team & Big Eight Newcomer of the Year)

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

The clock will be turned back briefly Saturday night in Ahearn Field House as ghosts of K-State's basketball past come back to fill the gymnasium's floor in the annual All Seasons Alumni Classic.

Almost 50 former Wildcat basketballers will return to Manhattan for the event, with more than 20 expected to suit up for the contest. The alumni game will be followed by an intra-squad scrimmage.

"(The alumni) are really looking forward to it," said first-year head coach Lon Kruger. "We've got between 40-50 coming back, and that's an indication of excitement I think. Certainly, we're proud of what they've done for Kansas State basketball, and we appreciate their interest in coming back for the weekend."

Those expected to suit up range from Ed Head, who played for the Wildcats from 1948-51, to Mark Bohm, who saw action for the 'Cats in the 1984-85 season. There has even been some speculation that Kruger himself may be persuaded to compete, but as of midweek, he would not confirm those rumors.

Larry Weigel, who played three seasons from 1964-67 and will suit up for the alumni game, said the event affords former players a chance to get reacquainted with one another and relive old times. Weigel is currently the executive director of the K-State Alumni Association.

"I see it as a fun time, and also an opportunity to lend support to the K-State basketball program," Weigel said.

Kruger's current troops, which have been stung by injuries throughout the early season, are slowly regaining their health. Senior center Ron Meyer practiced for the first time in three weeks Tuesday afternoon.

The team is still without the services of freshman center Howard Bonser, who is expected to be out roughly four weeks with mononucleosis, and senior Percy Eddie, who will be sidelined until January with a broken wrist.

This will be the team's last public exhibition until its Nov. 29 season opener against South Dakota in Ahearn.

The alumni game will begin at 7 p.m. Tickets for both contests will be $2 for adults, and $1 for senior citizens, high school students, and K-State students without season tickets. Those with season tickets will be admitted free.

NCAA to rehear arguments in Coleman eligibility case

By The Collegian Staff

K-State basketball player Norris Coleman is scheduled to meet with the National Collegiate Athletic Association's subcommittee on eligibility today.

Coleman, along with attorney Jeff Schemmel, will ask the NCAA to allow the 6-foot-8 forward to play immediately. As the NCAA ruling currently stands, Coleman will not be allowed to play for K-State until Feb. 27, 1987.

The 25-year-old Coleman was made ineligible by K-State on that date last year when the NCAA ruled that Coleman's high school grade point average was not sufficient for the Army veteran to receive an athletic scholarship.

It was earlier thought Coleman would seek a court injunction against the ruling, but at this time the NCAA has chosen to review the case.

For Coleman to be eligible for K-State's Nov. 29 season opener with South Dakota, the NCAA will either have to reverse its previous ruling or Coleman will have to file for an injunction.

Presentation addresses AIDS, sexually transmitted diseases

By LORI LUGINBILL
Collegian Reporter

Current estimates indicate that in the United States, about 2 million people may be carrying the AIDS virus without realizing it, said Dr. Larry Moeller, assistant student health physician at Lafene Student Health Center.

Acquired immune deficiency syndrome and sexually transmitted diseases were the topic of a presentation Thursday in the Union Little Theatre sponsored by Lafene and the Gay and Lesbian Resource Center.

Moeller delivered the presentation which began with a slide show about AIDS and STDs followed by a question-and-answer session.

The slide show composed by Moeller and his wife emphasized its purpose was not to moralize but to help people recognize their responsibilities to themselves and their relationships.

"Any sexual being is potentially at risk to get any of the sexually transmitted diseases," Moeller said.

AIDS is caused by a virus called HTLV-3 which paralyzes an important part of our immune system, he said.

"AIDS is not transmitted by casual contact. It can be contracted by intimate sexual contact and contaminated blood, for example blood transfusions. Donating blood, however, is not the risk factor," Moeller said.

Moeller said the fear of AIDS, sometimes called "afrAIDS," affects everyone. This is due in part to the psychosocial stigma applied to AIDS because it is a fatal disease, he said.

Currently, the mortality rate is about 50 percent, and only 15 percent of those diagnosed with AIDS in 1981 are still alive, Moeller said.

Education encouraging "safe sex" is an important method of combatting AIDS fear, he said. To reduce the risk of contracting AIDS, individuals should avoid multiple and anonymous sexual partners and intravenous "street drugs."

Individuals whose lifestyle places them at risk of contracting the virus should not donate blood, he said.

Seventy-three percent of AIDS victims are homosexual or bisexual, 17 to 18 percent are intravenous drug users and less than 3 percent are hemophiliacs — individuals whose blood fails to clot quickly, he said.

Moeller said in the United States, 13 men for every one woman now have the AIDS virus and more than half of all new cases diagnosed are I.V. drug abusers.

The AIDS virus frequently changes its anti-genisity, which interferes with the body's ability to recognize it. New immunizations and vaccines must continually be made to control it, he said.

About 15 new drugs have been tried as a cure for AIDS. AZT is a new drug that arrests the growth of the virus, but once stopped, growth resumes, Moeller said.

"It's a puny virus. It's really not a strong pathogenic virus at all," he said.

It is a fragile virus that cannot thrive outside of the body for long, Moeller said. Consequently, the virus cannot be contracted from a toilet seat or paper towels.

Individuals in a high risk group who think they may have the disease should have the courage to show up at a public health center or doctor's office and ask for the AIDS detection test, he said.

Byrd, Dole switch leadership roles

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats, flexing their new political muscle, reinstalled Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia as majority leader Thursday and Republicans picked Bob Dole of Kansas as minority leader for the 100th Congress which convenes Jan. 6.

That reverses the roles Byrd and Dole played in the 99th Congress and reflects the outcome of the Nov. 4 elections, which ended six years of GOP control in the Senate.

"We are in the majority and we are ready to do business," said Byrd, who has led Senate Democrats since 1977. He is returning to the majority position he held until 1980.

With each party's choices for its leadership posts all but settled in advance, there was no suspense as the 55 upbeat Democrats and 45 Republicans met privately in different rooms near the Senate chamber.

But the feisty Democrats served notice they intend to put together a comprehensive agenda of domestic and foreign policy issues to try to capture the legislative initiative from the White House early next year.

"We are not going to wait three months in the presidential waiting room. The president has his timetable, we have ours," Byrd said.

"We're going to send to the American people a signal that it is no longer business as usual."

Byrd called on the administration to send its fiscal 1988 budget to Congress on Jan. 5, as required by the Gramm-Rudman budget-balancing law. However, administration officials have said the spending proposal may not be ready until early February.

Byrd also said the Senate will be working in early January, instead of taking a recess.

Along with Byrd, who also was celebrating his 69th birthday, the Democrats re-elected their top leaders from the last Congress, including Alan Cranston of California as assistant majority leader and Daniel Inouye of Hawaii as chairman of the Senate Democratic caucus.

In addition to Dole, who will be facing his first Congress as minority leader, the Republicans re-elected their entire leadership team, including Alan K. Simpson of Wyoming as assistant leader and John H. Chafee of Rhode Island as Republican Conference chairman.

the Judicial Board," Sutton said.

Punishment could range from a warning to expulsion depending on the severity of the case, Sutton said.

Thursday night, Senate passed a bill calling for the closing of Aggieville at some point in the day. One section added to the original proposal called for support of any move by the merchants association, the Riley County Police Department and other agencies working toward the establishment of any policy to prevent distruction or further damage to Aggieville businesses and K-State's reputation.

Schottler said he appreciates concern Senate has shown toward the issue but would like to see them focus on measures dealing directly with students.

"We are very interested in what they have to say and would like their input, but at the same time many of us have been here several years and the experience we have gained over the years gives us more expertise in understanding and solving the situation as we see it," he said.

"We would like to see them form a policy that would influence their fellow students and help restore respect for both the merchants and the University," Schottler said.

Sally Traeger, Senate chairwoman and senior in marketing, said while the Judicial Council can punish violators, Student Senate doesn't have that power. She said senators want to voice their opinion on the matter to show alumni and the community that they are against any destruction or damage to property or the University's, or Aggieville's, reputation.

"We want to solve the problem, that's our No. 1 goal," she said.

"(Closing Aggieville) has the greatest potential, as far as we can see, for success as far as dispersing the number of people that might integrate into Aggieville," she said.

Traeger said the size of the crowd was not the only problem in past Aggieville disturbances. She said tensions between KU and K-State students, alcohol and people from other universities and Fort Riley added to the disturbance.

She said senators don't claim to be experts and are merely voicing what they believe is a part of a solution in ending Aggieville violence.

Schottler said the association's committee would welcome any further suggestions concerning the issue.

Two white males sought in recent beating, robbery

Between 2:30 and 3 a.m. on Oct. 4, an aggravated robbery occurred south of Manhattan in Riley County.

Investigation by the Riley County Police Department revealed that two identified suspects, described as white males in their 20s, picked the victim up at Mannequin's in Aggieville. The suspects, believed to be driving a pickup truck, drove the victim to an undetermined location south of the city.

There, the two suspects beat and robbed the victim of a brown leather wallet. The contents of the wallet were listed as cash, military identification and miscellaneous papers.

Total loss in the robbery was listed at more than $60.

Another similar incident has been reported in the Manhattan area.

If you have any information on this or any other crime, call Crime Stoppers in Manhattan at 539-7777.

Callers need not identify themselves and may qualify for a cash reward of up to $1,000.

staff and K-State to forward additional written materials to the Regents.

Presidents of the other Regents' schools also expressed concern for the mission statements. They requested more time to review the statements with their planning committees.

The University of Kansas was the only institution having a mission statement that included all of its requested programs.

"It's absurd to say everything is a major thrust," said Charles Reagan, assistant to the president. "If every program is a major emphasis, then no program is a major emphasis."

The Regents will vote on the adoption of the mission statements at its December meeting.

Students may face semester tuition increase

Budget cuts force Regents to consider raising costs

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents will consider in December whether to increase student tuition to defray part of the budget cuts being imposed by Governor-elect Mike Hayden.

The Regents voted Friday to apportion equally among the institutions it supervises the 3.8-percent budget reduction Hayden ordered earlier this week. The cuts are designed to avert deficit spending by the state in the face of a projected $93-million tax revenue shortfall this fiscal year.

The Regents must trim $12.1 million from the $322 million it received from the state general fund for the current fiscal year to meet Hayden's 3.8-percent mandate.

However, several Regents and university heads complained loudly about the potential damage the cuts may cause to the schools, which absorbed a $12-million cut four years ago.

"We're beyond cutting fat," Wichita State President Warren Armstrong said. "We're cutting bone and marrow and muscle tissue significantly."

Regents Executive Director Stanley Koplik said that if this budget is not modified and is simply added onto the 1982 reductions, "you're really looking at severe damage to the institutions."

This additional cut, Koplik added, "is a very, very bitter pill to swallow."

The Regents and university presidents vowed to mount a concerted effort to persuade Hayden and legislative leaders that the universities cannot shoulder this additional reduction and maintain program quality to provide services the people expect.

The Regents also gave first reading to a motion that contains two options for implementing a tuition increase that would have students make up about one-tenth of the lost revenue. However, several regents questioned whether that should be done, and wording of a letter from the Budget Division cast doubt on whether Hayden would allow it.

Coup attempt prompts administration firings in Filipino government

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines — President Corazon Aquino fired her entire Cabinet, including controversial Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile, after the army foiled a coup attempt Sunday by dissident officers and political foes.

Aquino credited army chief of staff Gen. Fidel V. Ramos with taking "preventative measures against the recklessness of some elements in the military."

She warned that "sternest measures" would be taken if anyone tried to undermine her nine-month-old government.

The president also accused the communist rebels, who have waged a 17-year insurgency, of showing no interest in peace and said she would end negotiations if a cease-fire is not reached this month. Enrile and other critics accused her of being soft on the rebels.

Aquino spoke over national television.

Ramos issued a statement confirming that politicians loyal to deposed President Ferdinand E. Marcos, backed by "some elements in the military," had planned to set up a rival government. He said the situation was under control.

He did not identify the plotters or mention Enrile. The defense chief, who also served under Marcos but helped oust him last February, increasingly has been critical of Aquino.

A senior government official said the plot involved taking over the National Assembly, reinstating the pro-Marcos National Assembly abolished by Aquino and calling presidential elections.

The official, who demanded anonymity, said more than 100 members of a military faction identified with Enrile were in on the plot, with the coup to begin at 2 a.m. Sunday. The government learned of it at 10 a.m. Saturday, he said.

Troops loyal to Aquino and Ramos surrounded radio and television stations in Manila and elsewhere Saturday, and tightened security measures at the presidential palace and other key points.

The official said he did not know if Enrile knew about the plot.

On Sunday, after holding a lengthy Cabinet meeting, Aquino announced on television that she had asked all Cabinet members to resign.

She said Enrile complied, and she immediately swore in his replacement, Deputy Defense Minister Rafael Ileto.

Ileto, 66, later met with officers of the Reform the Armed Forces Movement, who like Enrile wanted a tougher line taken against communist insurgents.

"He (Ileto) asked for unity and we said yes," said Col. Gregorio Honasan, Enrile's security chief.

Enrile refused to see reporters who gathered outside his home at a fashionable

Initial commission hearing to determine bus line's fate in service to regional area

From Staff and Wire Reports

Manhattan is to serve as the first site for 18 public hearings scheduled by the Kansas Corporation Commission regarding a request from Trailways Lines Inc. for permission to abandon most of its bus services in the state.

The local public hearing regarding the request is scheduled for 1:30 p.m. today at the City Commission Meeting Room at the Manhattan City Administration Building, 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue.

Trailways, the largest provider of bus service in Kansas, wants to eliminate bus service to 62 of the 75 Kansas communities it now serves, effective April 1, 1987.

During last Tuesday night's meeting of the Manhattan City Commission, Mayor Rick Mann said the the city should work with neighboring communities, such as Ogden and Junction City, to present a unified effort against the proposal.

On Dec. 1, the commission will swing west and gather public comment at 9 a.m. in the Sherman County Courthouse in Goodland, at 2:30 p.m. in the Norton County Courthouse in Norton and at 7:30 p.m. in the Fort Hays State University student union in Hays.

Other hearings are scheduled for different locations throughout the state.

On Aug. 29, Trailways filed with the commission a request to drop all but one Kansas route: from Kansas City to Wichita via Topeka, Lawrence, Emporia, Augusta, Winfield and Arkansas City.

Routes to be dropped are: Wichita to Pueblo, Colo.; Wichita to Joplin, Mo.; Kansas City, Mo. to Joplin; Kansas City, Mo. to Denver; and Wichita to Lincoln, Neb.

The proposal would leave 40 cities without any bus service. In addition, it would put a large number of Trailways drivers and mechanics, estimated at 200 stationed in Kansas, out of work and hurt restaurants, hotels and businesses that rely on the bus for trade from passengers and freight for their operations.

In the most recent filing, dated Oct. 20, Trailways said it lost $15.7 million from its operations nationwide during the 12 months ending with August.

Firemen, city argue about pay bonuses

By CHRISTINE DOLL
Collegian Reporter

A disagreement between firefighters and the city administration regarding pay bonuses for firefighters may result in legal action.

The conflict is merit pay vs. longevity pay. The city is supporting the practice of merit pay, which is awarding bonuses for exceptional service. The firefighters prefer longevity-pay bonuses, reflecting the amount of time served with the department.

"We think they should reward those who have been here longer," said Sid Hamilton, president of Manhattan Firefighters' Union, Local 2275.

During a public hearing at a meeting of the Manhattan City Commission Nov. 4, Commissioner Dave Fiser said, "I want to pay our firefighters a good wage. But I'm more interested in paying...for above-average performance.

"I'm not interested in continuing a system that leads to mediocracy or less, and that's what longevity pay leads to."

The current contract offers a yearly $300 bonus to firefighters who have worked for 10 years or more. In the new contract, firefighters would earn a $500 bonus if yearly evaluations indicate their performance merits a raise.

Hamilton said he believes the city's intent is to eventually pay all union members the same salary.

He also said he believes very few people will earn the bonus because the requirements are too stringent and it is impossible for firefighters to move into management positions.

The firefighters' contract will end Dec. 31. The parties, which have been negotiating for the past three months, have not been able to come to an agreement on a new contract.

The union objects to merit pay for two reasons.

Hamilton said the union gave up concessions such as lighter work loads and larger pay increases for longevity pay when the current contract was signed three years ago.

"We did get better longevity pay, but then they took it away from us," Hamilton said.

Randy Forbes, who represented the union during negotiations, said he thought it was "incredibly unfair" to allow the union to give up increases in pay for the longevity program.

The second objection to merit pay is that it does not objectively judge the firefighters' work.

"It's too subjective," Hamilton said. "We have been complaining about it for years."

The wording of the new contract states that for firefighters to earn the $300 bonus, they must receive an exceptional rating in nine out of 12 judged categories. They cannot receive an unsatisfactory rating in any of the categories to be eligible for the bonus.

The judging is done by the firefighters' superiors.

"If somebody has a flat tire on the way to work one time during the year, they could not get an exceptional rating in that category (of

Poll results focus on negative aspects of design curriculum

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Results of an architecture alumni poll revealing dissatisfaction are said by the college's dean to be intentionally biased but are considered an accurate reflection by the survey compiler.

Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design, said positive answers from the survey results were not emphasized because the survey was given to determine weaknesses in the curriculum.

"To make the document useful, we chose the most negative comments (to include on the result sheet)," Lapping said. "Why acknowledge the good, that doesn't help you get any better."

Lapping said the results will help him form long-range plans for improving the curriculum of the college.

The survey was sent to 3,800 alumni in February and 14 percent responded, said Robert Jackson, director of development for the College of Architecture and Design and author of the report.

"The printed results were an accurate cross section of the responses," Jackson said.

Questions asked on the study dealt with strengths and weaknesses of the college, curriculum improvement recommendations and how the college could help professionals.

Answers most commonly mentioned were lack of technical (structural design in particular), business and professional practice courses and an overemphasis on design and theory.

Technical courses that architecture students are required to take at K-State include Elementary Applied Mathematics, Descriptive Physics and Structural Systems in Architecture I and II.

Lapping said survey results reinforced the notion that technical courses needed to be reviewed.

"I think we were pretty much aware of that ourselves," he said.

Lapping said he is forming an in-house task force to study current technical courses to determine what changes should be implemented.

Jackson said the program could be improved by adding classes that are offered at the University of Kansas, the University of Illinois and Iowa State University.

"All three have good structural design programs for architecture students that I would

Egypt says U.S. lacks credibility

CAIRO, Egypt — President Hosni Mubarak said Sunday that U.S. credibility in the Arab world has deteriorated because of the Iran arms deal and urged President Reagan to take action to prevent further damage.

Mubarak, speaking at the end of a two-day summit with King Hussein of Jordan, said he sent a message to Reagan to ask about the "very astonishing" situation.

"I asked him, and still am asking ... the United States, to do something so as not to lose its credibility in the Arab world because of such an act," he said at a news conference attended by Hussein.

"I hope something could be done in the very near future so as to keep this credibility, because I'm afraid it's started to deteriorate," he added.

All Arab states except Syria and Libya support Iraq in its 6-year-old war with Iran, a non-Arab nation. Egypt has sold an estimated $1 billion worth of weapons to Iraq since 1981.

Gunmen hijack Red Cross chopper

ROME — Two gunmen hijacked a Red Cross helicopter Sunday, lifted two inmates from a prison courtyard and flew away firing automatic weapons at guards, police said.

A third prisoner dashed toward the helicopter but slipped in the rain.

The chopper landed a short time later in a Rome soccer field where a match was under way, and hijackers and convicts fled by car. Police set up roadblocks and searched the region with helicopters.

Officials said the hijackers spoke French and that one jailbreaker, a Tunisian-born Frenchman, was sought by French authorities in connection with a Paris bank robbery and murder. The other fugitive reportedly was suspected of supplying arms to Italian terrorists.

Police said the hijackers walked into San Camillo Hospital in western Rome and cornered the helicopter pilot, 42-year-old Mauro Pompa.

They handcuffed Pompa's 10-year-old son to a radiator and forced Pompa at gunpoint to take them to the helicopter parked across the street.

Nebraskans sixth in life expectancy

OMAHA, Neb. — Nebraskans rank sixth nationally in average life expectancy, according to figures released by the National Center for Health Statistics.

The agency of the Department of Health and Human Services indicates Nebraskans live an average of 75.5 years, sixth behind Hawaii's 77 years, Minnesota's 76.2, Iowa and Utah at 75.8 and North Dakota 75.7.

Every 10 years the center does a state-by-state comparison of life expectancy. To calculate the figure, the center uses actual and estimated Census Bureau statistics over a three-year period and runs the information through a complex mathematical process.

Nebraska became undisputed champion in the 1960s when the center, using statistics from 1959, 1960 and 1961, concluded that the average life expectancy of men and women in the state was 71.95 years.

Nebraska remained No. 1 for more than 10 years. However, when the statistics center recalculated life expectancy with rates based on 1969, 1970 and 1971 figures, Nebraska fell to fifth.

Workers return to GM after strike

KOKOMO, Ind. — Workers began returning to a key parts plant Sunday after a strike that forced layoffs of more than 47,000 General Motors Corp. workers nationwide, but GM officials could not say when the layoffs would end.

The six-day strike at the Delco Electronics plant triggered layoffs in eight states and threatened to shut down the nation's No. 1 automaker as the supply of radios and electronic parts for all GM cars was exhausted.

The 7,700 United Auto Workers at the GM subsidiary walked off the job Nov. 17 in a dispute over subcontracting and a plan to produce Delco's newest radio line in Mexico.

A contract resolving those issues and implementing Japanese management techniques was approved overwhelmingly Saturday by UAW Local 292.

UAW shop chairman Mike Thayer said some production workers returned at midnight Saturday and the first full shift would start at midnight Sunday.

John Mueller, a GM spokesman in Detroit, said he didn't know when the stalled assembly plants might resume production.

"It depends on how much there is in the system still, and when they can get this stuff out of Kokomo," Mueller said.

Teens shoot, slash seven children

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. — Two youths were being held Sunday by the East St. Louis Police Department on suspicion of shooting six children and slashing another's throat at their home Saturday night.

Three of the injured children remained in hospitalized in critical condition Sunday.

Lt. Robert Henry, chief of detectives for the Department, said police arrested a 14-year-old boy and a 19-year-old man early Sunday morning for questioning in the attacks on the seven children, all members of the same family.

Their parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Wilbourn, were not at home when the attack took place. Authorities said Wilbourn was at work and his wife had gone shopping.

Wilbourn said he knew the assailants and believed they were members of a street gang. He said the intruders broke into the basement through a coal chute.

Henry said police would probably seek warrants Monday for six counts of attempted murder, one of attempted sexual assault and one of home invasion.

In critical condition at Cardinal Glennon in St. Louis, where they were taken by helicopter, were John Jr., 7, Mellissa, 5, and Emmanuel, 4, all suffering from gunshot wounds.

Another child, Jonnata, 6, was airlifted Saturday night to Children's Hospital, also in St. Louis, where she was in satisfactory condition with gunshot wounds to the buttocks and abdomen, a spokesman said.

Gasoline prices fall in last 2 weeks

LOS ANGELES — The average price of gasoline dipped fractionally to 84.35 cents a gallon over the last two weeks despite small increases in wholesale prices, the Lundberg Survey reported Sunday.

Two weeks earlier, the average price, which includes all grades and taxes, was 84.63 cents a gallon, according to the survey of 15,000 gas stations nationwide.

The average price a year ago was $1.21 a gallon.

The latest survey found that at self-service pumps, the average price of regular leaded was 71.43 cents, regular unleaded was 76.27 cents and premium unleaded was 90.88 cents.

Iraqi warplanes bomb cities; Iran vows to begin shelling

By The Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iraqi warplanes bombed two western Iranian cities Sunday, killing 112 civilians, Iran reported. It vowed to retaliate by shelling Iraqi cities.

Iraq confirmed it bombed the cities, Bakhtaran and Islamabad Gharb. It said the targets were an air base, an oil refinery and military camps.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency said the attack killed 98 civilians and wounded others in Bakhtaran, also known as Kermanshah. It said 25 houses were destroyed or badly damaged.

War information headquarters in Tehran said Iranian forces would shell Iraqi cities "in retaliation for the savage Iraqi air raids," IRNA reported.

Police penalize bar for serving underaged

By The Collegian Staff

Individuals residing in Manhattan during Thanksgiving vacation won't be able to "party" at Rocky Mountain Bonkers Tuesday through Thursday.

Bonkers, 12th and Laramie streets, will be closed as a penalty for two citings of minors drinking in the establishment, said Richard Hodson, staff attorney for the Alcoholic Beverage Control Agency.

"There were a total of two cases, both involving (minors) consuming alcohol," he said.

Hodson said two minors were found consuming alcohol each time: on Aug. 28 by an officer of the Riley County Police Department and on Sept. 24 by an ABC investigator.

Greg Salazar, co-owner of Bonkers, said he would not comment on the ruling.

While the severity of the punishment could be questioned considering it will be served during three days when most students will be out of town, Hodson said the ABC doesn't determine which days the suspension must be served.

He said ABC doesn't want penalty days to conflict with events the club has scheduled.

"(ABC lets the club decide) so that our choice of days does not create a greater penalty than a closure on normal business days," Hodson said.

Kite's Bar & Grille, 619 N. 12th St., also was charged with allowing a minor to consume alcohol on Sept. 24, but the penalty has not been set, Hodson said.

Child care unit bakes canine presents

Students make doggie biscuit treats

By The Collegian Staff

For more than eight months, Chris Fahrenholz, chairwoman of the KSU Child Care Cooperative's fund-raising committee, had what she thought was a doggone good idea brewing in her mind.

Now, through the efforts of parents of the KSU Child Care Cooperative, her idea will become reality this month. With the help of more than 50 parents, she is coordinating the baking of more than 10,000 dog biscuits.

Fahrenholz, who has a child in the cooperative, said she thought of making biscuits as a fund-raiser about eight months ago, but "nobody went for it."

But because the center needs extra money to buy toys and educational items for the children, the parents decided it was time to give the idea a shot, she said.

The dog biscuits, to be made by the parents, will be packaged and sold as canine Christmas presents in an effort to raise $1,000 for the child care center.

"The kids will take the ingredients home Tuesday, and then by Dec. 1, we should have the biscuits back," she said.

About 50 parents will bake nearly 200 biscuits each. Many of the ingredients for the project were donated by the K-State grain science department, she said. The donated ingredients are mainly the various types of flour needed for the biscuits, she said.

After the children return the finished biscuits, they will be separated into sets of 10 each and placed in paper bags, which the children will decorate.

"It should be a good art project for them," Fahrenholz said.

The biscuits will sell for $1 a bag. Sales of the pet presents will be Dec. 5 in the Union and at Wal-Mart, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Area merchants raise funds for needy

By TAMA ERICKSON
Collegian Reporter

The merchants of Manhattan are joining hands to raise money for the needy during this Christmas season.

"'Manhattan Caring and Sharing' is the theme for the drive," said Bill Jacoby, executive director for the Aggieville Merchants Association.

Jacoby said the two local organizations being assisted by The Mayor's Christmas Tree Fund are the Flint Hills Bread Basket and the Energy Assistance Committee.

"The Flint Hills Bread Basket helps those people (countywide) and citywide who have problems obtaining food," Jacoby said.

The Flint Hills Bread Basket, 901 Yuma St., provides approximately 300 baskets of food for the needy during the Christmas season. The organization also collects and distributes food throughout the year.

"The Energy Assistance Committee helps individuals that have trouble meeting utility bills," Jacoby said. These needy individuals have to meet certain qualifications in order to qualify for help.

Included among those qualifications are income levels, expenses and family size.

The Energy Assistance Committee is designed to make sure those really in need get the proper assistance, he said.

Jacoby noted that the committee's federal grant of $13,000 has been completely cut.

The city of Manhattan has helped put back $10,000 of that grant, but $3,000 still needs to be raised through efforts such as the Mayor's Christmas Tree Fund, Jacoby said.

Cash donations can be sent to Kansas State Bank, 1010 Westloop, or in specially marked jars located in various businesses throughout the city.

Food donations also can be left at numerous locations citywide including grocery stores, which are serving as collection points for food and cash donations.

Donations also can be made by contacting the Aggieville Merchants Association, which will be coordinating the donation process.

The merchants are willing to see to it that the donations reach the Mayor's Christmas Tree Fund, Jocoby said.

He said $400 in contributions already have been sent to the Kansas State Bank by area organizations and businesses.

"The merchants of Aggieville are really involved," said Mayor Rick Mann. "About every business has a jar drop (for cash) and food can be dropped off there, too."

"Aggieville is heading the whole thing," Jacoby said. "The merchants are putting up the funds to get the whole thing going. It is a citywide fund-raiser that it all boils down to."

"If everyone could give one can, it would be great," Mann said.

The Aggieville Merchants Association is the vehicle to help coordinate a way to get people involved during the Christmas season to help the needy, Jacoby said. The Mayor's Christmas Tree Fund is a broad-based cooperative throughout the city with one major drive to get people sparked into action, he said.

A tree-lighting ceremony is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Dec. 2 in Triangle Park, located at the intersection of Anderson and North Manhattan avenues.

The tree, which is expected to be between 25 and 30 feet tall, is being donated by the Hoffman Tree Farm, Manhattan.

Decorations for the tree are being made by students from the Bluemont Elementary School.

Jacoby also said there will be caroling at the site.

"If a certain group wants to perform, we will set up a schedule so they can do so," Jacoby said. "The whole city is really involved. We would like to get K-State and its students involved.

"Next year will be even that much bigger. We are patterning (the drive) after the Mayor's Christmas Tree fund in Kansas City, which raised $400,000 for utilities."

University to provide counsel to employees

By The Collegian Staff

In an effort to help eliminate or alleviate situations hindering job performances, the University is adopting an Employee Assistance Program to provide help for K-State employees with personal problems.

The program, effective Jan. 1, 1987, will offer assistance to faculty, staff and student employees of the University, said Joe Younger, EAP program coordinator and manager of staff training and development in the Office of Personnel Services.

"One out of every 10 employees suffers from a personal problem serious enough to impair job performance," Younger said. "It is the desire of the University to help rather than merely discipline employees whose job performance deterioration is caused by such a problem."

Problems affecting employee performance include financial difficulties, mental health, domestic violence, legal questions and chemical abuse or dependencies.

The program will be strictly voluntary, Younger said. Employees who need assistance may be referred to the program by a supervisor, family member or themselves.

The KSU Family Center, Lafene Student Health Center and Counseling Center are three services offered on campus, he said. In addition, nearly 150 other services are offered in the Manhattan area.

"The Employee Assistance Program is an education, intervention and referral service to help employees get in touch with their personal problems and concerns," Younger said. "K-State is genuinely interested in the health and well-being of its primary resource — people."

Nationally, the EAP began as a development from alcoholism programs in the 1940s. By 1979, the program was established and piloted in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services for the state of Kansas.

The EAP and Health Promotion PLUS programs, which formed a coalition in 1984, became the current program for all state agencies.

Library closes to fumigate; insects endanger old books

By The Collegian Staff

Farrell Library will be closed Wednesday through Friday for a "massive fumigation" to rid the library of silverfish and other insects endangering the longevity of the University's books.

The building will be sealed, and no one will be allowed in the building for three days, said Sara Williams, conservation librarian.

"Our main problem is with silverfish," Williams said. "Older books are bound with hide glue, and (silverfish) find the animal product tasty."

Library personnel hope to have to close the building only once, she said.

Newer books are being bound with polyvinal acetate. Insects do not eat synthetic materials, she said.

"We've been working with the Office of Campus Safety," Williams said. "There will be no health risks, residue or smell."

The library will be open until 7 p.m. Tuesday and will reopen from noon to 4 p.m. Saturday. Regular hours will resume on Sunday, when the library will be open from 1 to 11 p.m.

Volcanic eruptions in Japan force evacuations

By The Associated Press

TOKYO — Mount Mihara subsided Sunday after a fiery eruption that forced 11,000 people to flee a small island, but hundreds of miles away another volcano erupted and sent a big rock flying into a hotel, injuring five people.

Officials said Mount Sakurajima hurled a rock 6½ feet in diameter into a one-story concrete hotel just outside Sakurajima, about 620 miles southwest of Tokyo.

Officials of the Central Meteorological Agency said Mount Sakurajima has erupted often since 1955, including 474 eruptions last year. Police said 15 people were in the hotel at the time and two were seriously hurt.

Officials said the eruption was not linked with that of Mount Mihara, about 540 miles away on Oshima Island. Oshima is 70 miles south of Tokyo.

One Central Meteorological Agency official said about 30 gas explosions were recorded Sunday morning in the craters of Mount Mihara, compared with countless explosions Saturday, but that none was observed Sunday afternoon.

Only light smoke was seen coming from the mountain, but streams of yellow water were observed on the island's eastern and southern sides, indicating possible underwater eruptions, the official said.

He spoke on condition of anonymity.

The volcano, dormant for 12 years, erupted twice last week. The second eruption, on Friday, sent lava streaming toward Oshima Island's main town and forced the evacuation of more than 11,000 people, including tourists and nearly all 10,300 residents.

The agency official said 54 earthquakes had been counted on the island on Sunday by 8 p.m. The strongest measured 4 on the Richter scale.

On Saturday, 92 quakes were recorded, with the strongest 6.1 on the Richter scale, he said.

The Richter scale is a gauge of the energy released by an earthquake, as measured by the ground motion recorded on a seismograph. A quake measuring 6 is capable of causing serious damage.

Hidehiro Kato, an official of the Tokyo Fire Department, said lava had come within 165 yards of the town of Motomachi, but had almost stopped.

Tokyo police said more than 400 people still were on the island, including more than 200 police and 130 journalists.

Excuses run rampant for Iranian arms deal

Soon after the press revealed the United States shipped arms to Iran, one State Department spokesman, (who, as usual, would not give his name) said with prophetic understatement, "We're going to have a tough time for a while explaining what happened."

As the sordid affair continues to unfold, the administration is having a tough time explaining its actions. And the presidential double talk has done little to help the situation.

Despite Reagan's efforts to portray the arms deals as "a secret diplomatic initiative" designed to gain influence with Iranian moderates, one official familiar with the operations asserted that the primary goal from the beginning was to secure the release of hostages and that the diplomatic aspects were drawn up as a cover story.

Reagan said on national television that Iran had renounced its former support of terrorism, yet someone forgot to tell the State Department, which continues to list Iran among the nations supporting terrorism.

If the so-called moderates in Iran have control over the various terrorist groups in Lebanon, then why were additional hostages taken after the administration began shipping arms? If these moderate factions did not have influence among the terrorist cells in Lebanon, then why were arms sent at all?

But even if the president wanted to lie to the American population, it made little practical sense not to inform members of his own cabinet. If all appropriate cabinet members were informed, as the president attests, why did Caspar Weinberger spend last month trekking around China trying to convince leaders of that nation not to sell arms to Iran.

George Shultz did the same in a number of Middle East countries. Are the secretaries of defense and state no longer appropriate cabinet members when sending arms to a nation with a history of hostile activity?

And what of Reagan's charge that the press had blown the administration's cover by exposing the arms deal? As CBS News anchor Dan Rather asked, "This was not secret from the Soviets, it certainly wasn't secret from the Iranians, the Syrians knew about it, who besides the American people didn't know about it?"

Two weeks ago, as Reagan offered a weak explanation as to why the American people are not informed of his questionable policies, he said, "As president, I've always operated on the belief that, given the facts, the American people will make the right decision." How else can one explain Reagan's undying support in this country?

French President de Gaulle vetoes Britain's effort to enter the Common Market. Governments change in Canada by a vote of no confidence; Iraq, Syria, South Vietnam receive new governments by coup.

The Beatles are big in Britain and will hit the United States in just a few weeks.

But to a large segment of the world's population, 1963 will be remembered as the year John Fitzgerald Kennedy, the 35th president of the United States, was assassinated in Dallas.

Although many current K-State students were not yet born when Kennedy was assassinated 23 years ago Saturday, it is doubtful they have escaped the legacy. Perhaps that legacy has been perpetuated by his vicious death at a relatively young age. For many, it may be hard to believe that if he were still alive, Kennedy would be celebrating his 70th birthday in May.

Through the years, new information, along with the wearing of the lustre from the "Camelot" presidency, has led to questions as to the credibility of that legacy.

Kennedy, although reared in a wealthy, New England family with ties to politics (and other ventures), did not seek public office for himself.

According to Michael S. Medved, writing for The People's Almanac, Kennedy's father, Joseph, announced that John would enter the political arena following the World War II death of Joe Kennedy Jr. John, instead, had obtained employment as a newspaper reporter for the Hearst newspapers.

Medved quotes Joe Sr. as saying, "I told him Joe (Jr.) was dead and it was his responsibility to run for Congress. He didn't want to. But I told him he had to."

That message was reportedly delivered to Kennedy while he was recovering from injuries suffered during naval action.

Kennedy's war record, made even more famous by the movie "PT-109," and his family's influence in political circles made it possible for him to go to Washington, D.C., serving as senator for Massachusetts. He defeated Henry Cabot Lodge by 70,000 votes in a state that went to Eisenhower for the presidency by 200,000 votes.

Another contributing factor to the legacy is that Kennedy was the first Catholic to be elected president and the youngest president in the history of that office.

Perhaps the Kennedy "clan" was the perfect family for this point in history, when technical advances allowed the president and his family to become more identifiable to the public.

Kennedy, his wife Jacqueline and his children were the young, prosperous family that could be shown to the nation via television cameras, allowing the nation to not only look inside the White House, but also to inspect its inhabitants as never before permissible.

But the live camera also forced the nation to see the literal destruction of "Camelot," if such a situation actually existed.

That view is shared by Lawrence O'Brien, an aide to Kennedy for 14 years. In the Nov. 28, 1983 issue of Newsweek magazine, O'Brien wrote, "I don't think there was a Camelot, however."

"I believe that image came about because of the glamour of the man....But really, what it was all about was hard work, seven days a week, every waking sailor, to try to accomplish the objectives of the presidency and reach the objectives of his program."

The assassination of Kennedy, to many, marked the end of a time of "progressivism," prompting the years 1963-1973 to be labeled as "The Turbulent Years" in the book, The 20th Century: An Almanac, edited by Robert H. Ferrell.

The difference in images between Kennedy's inauguration speech with his polished exuberance and the disjointed, confused resignation of Richard M. Nixon at the end of this era reveal this turbulence.

A poll, conducted by The Gallup Organization for that issue, indicated that 30 percent of those polled wished Kennedy was still president, with 44 percent ranking him as a "good" president, compared to a 31-percent "great" ranking. Three percent rated him a "poor" president.

In the same survey, 65 percent stated that American society would be "much different" if he were still alive, with 23 percent disagreeing and 12 percent indicating "no opinion."

But would the '60s have been as turbulent with his survival?

The poll indicated that 44 percent believed the unrest of the '60s would have occurred regardless; 32 percent believed the social situation would have been different. Twenty-four percent issued no opinion.

Perhaps the best effort toward retaining the image of "Camelot" is reflected by actions of the city of Dallas.

Dallas no longer commemorates the anniversary of his assassination. Instead, it commemorates his birthdate, May 29. His surviving brother, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., visited the grave in Arlington National Cemetary Saturday.

It is important to remember the Kennedy presidency for its activity, not the rose-colored imagery.

But the Kennedy clan is not gone from the political world, with John F. Kennedy's nephew, Joseph Kennedy II, being elected this month to the Senate chair currently held by House Speaker Tip O'Neill.

University must trim unnecessary spending

K-State will have to absorb a $3.06 million reduction in aid from the state due to Governor-elect Mike Hayden's request for a 3.8-percent across-the-board reduction in the state budget. This loss in revenue for the University should be absorbed in a manner that doesn't affect classes or other educational programs.

Hayden's 3.8-percent cut is in response to a projected shortfall in state tax revenues of $93 million, which translates into the $3.06-million cut for K-State. With a small and declining student population and with a never-ending request for money from different areas of the University, this cut represents a crisis for K-State.

In response to this crisis, the administration should respond appropriately by passing these cuts on to non-essential areas on campus instead of sacrificing quality education. In accomplishing this, the University should quit wasting tens of thousands of dollars on an information booth or spending thousands more on frivolous signs telling people where K-State is.

By painting trash cans every other year instead of every year and spending less on lawn care and other non-essential areas, the campus may not look as nice as it did before and students may have to live with a few more inconveniences. Nonetheless, when in a crisis, we can afford to make temporary sacrifices in these areas.

In helping the state's universities absorb some of this cut, the Kansas Board of Regents will consider increasing tuition between $15 and $25 per student. This will mean that students at K-State will have to pay 13 percent of the $3.06-million cut.

Whatever the University or Regents decide to do to handle this cut in budget, they should not resort to cutting programs that damage the purpose of providing a good education.

Middlemen threaten state's farmers

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

For those who thought I was going to continue my attacks on the village idiot residing at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., surprise! President Reagan's fog of deception is starting to blow away, and I am going to sit back and watch the show awhile. My focus this week is on the farming problem.

American agriculture is in a sorry state. Farmers are going bankrupt because they produce too much, yet many people in this country and around the world are starving to death.

Most everyone is aware of the farming problem, especially in this state. This is good because recognizing the problem is half the battle. What is needed now is a solution. Many solutions have been thrown around, most of them unsuccessfully. Most of these solutions were no more than short-term relief programs. What we need is a real solution that tackles the fundamental problem — the distribution of agricultural products.

To see this problem of distribution, one must look at the winners and losers of the farming game. Farmers are not getting paid enough for their products, which puts them on the losing side. Consumers are paying more than they should for food, considering the great surplus of agricultural products, which puts them on the losing side, too.

But there are some big winners in the farming game. The people on the ends lose, while the people in the middle win. These are the big merchants of agricultural products. These people make big profits no matter what the economy is doing. They have the power to push farm prices down, then sell the product for a much-inflated price. They profit at the expense of everyone else.

My plan has to do with getting rid of the middlemen and letting farmers receive what they should for their products, while the consumers will get a break from paying the overinflated prices of food sold to them by middlemen.

This plan is offered as a suggestion only, not as some set-in-stone policy. I am not an expert, but it seems as though the experts are not doing too well with this problem, either. This is one of many solutions to the problem of distribution. It has its advantages and disadvantages that must be weighed before any attempt is made to implement such a plan, as it should be with any plan.

For starters, I would like to outline a plan of action for Kansas. First, to get rid of the middlemen, the state should take over the purchasing of all grain in Kansas. This is a drastic change, but the benefits will far outweigh the costs. By getting rid of these middlemen, the state could have control over the domestic price of grain. This will solve the farmers' problem, which is good for the economy of the state.

But what happens to all the grain the state buys? The solution is for the state to take over the role vacated by the grain merchants. It could start its own milling and bakery operations here in Kansas. This would create many jobs in the state and keep money in the state. K-State would be a good place to start an operation like this, considering it is one of the only universities in the world that has milling and bakery science curriculums.

The state could then distribute its own food products. It could ship Kansas bread and bakery products around the country. The products could be competitively priced, yet the income of the farmers would go up. The profits usually taken by the middlemen would be distributed to the farmers, those working in the milling and bakery operations and the state itself.

The state does not have to stop at bakery products. It could sell the milled flour, too. It also could work out its own deals with other countries, such as China or the Soviet Union.

There are many ways to make this work. The big grain merchants make enormous profits, and so can the state if it takes over the merchants' role in the marketplace. These profits would be used to benefit the many farmers.

This plan so far has been presented on a state level, but there is no reason this plan couldn't work on a national, or even international, scale. The point is to let the producers receive the rewards for their products. This is of paramount importance. We have to stop people from getting rich off the labor of others.

Don't close Aggie

Editor,

There is a serious breech of democracy in the making. It is the proposal to shut down Aggieville for the day of next year's University of Kansas vs. K-State game. This is the most ridiculous offer Manhattan has ever proposed. What is worse is that some students are backing this. This is completely out of the question for several reasons.

First, if the city thinks that it has enough power to say what businesses are to shut down, for how long and what time to do so, they had better read the Constitution again. It also would cost the city and its merchants a large source of revenue. People come from all over, but not just to buy beer and have a riot. They buy clothes, sporting goods, etc., in Aggieville all weekend. So much control over business practices sounds like a little bit of Russia to me.

Second, it is said that closing Aggieville will disperse the crowd and put it in smaller segments. Where will it disperse the crowd and how much smaller segments would be the next question. Four thousand people in smaller segments will still leave relatively large parties. Who will control these groups? It can't possibly be the police or the National Guard if they are to guard Aggieville from intruders. These groups will end up just where you don't want them: in residential areas and on our roads. With police in Aggieville, people will be more free to speed and drive drunk.

Third, if people come to town for a riot, they're going to have one. If you break up the crowd, then you will get more counter-control behavior on your hands. The collective riots will end up being more damaging than anything that could happen in Aggieville. Then we'll wonder what a few thousand dollars damage actually meant to us. I would recommend scheduling the game on Halloween in that case, since large-scale destruction would be the norm.

To suggest a solution, bottled beer has got to go for the day. This will cut down on window and sign destruction because the bottles are used as projectiles. Also, there are far too many minors in Aggieville. We could put that new drinking-age law to very good use. Manhattan police could block off Aggieville before the "party" begins and check IDs of all entrants, because the street ends up becoming the bar itself. This would cut down on crowd size and, hence, reduce some of the mob behavior. Last, if you are going to set up cameras, you should use them. I distinctly remember a photograph of all the people tipping the car on the front page of the Collegian. If it comes to that, use the Royal Purple for a mug book.

We can come up with a much better solution than shutting down Aggieville. All we need to do is not take the first impulse that comes to mind. But think about it for a while and come up with a reasonable alternative.

No athletic fee

Editor,

I realize that the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics needs more money, but should the burden of coming up with the money be placed on the students in the form of an athletic fee?

If the athletic fee is passed, it will open the door for other departments at K-State to ask for special fees.

The solution to the problem only can be solved by increased efforts in the athletic department through fund-raisers and community events. This will allow those individuals wanting to get involved the opportunity to do so while not forcing any cost upon others.

Student thieves

Editor,

My concern is the forced entries into professors' offices to steal exams. These students are cheating themselves and the other students in the class. They are cheating the companies that hire them because they do not have the firm foundation on which the company is depending. But most important, they hurt the reputation of K-State and lessen the credibility of all our diplomas.

Those of us who do not cheat need to come forward with information about these break-ins. But our responsibilities do not end there. We must impress upon these people that what they are doing is wrong. Our best move is to stop those who are thinking about cheating before they cheat. K-State has enough external problems without adding to these a reputation of cheating. It is time to stop the childish actions and become college students. There is an old saying, "If you cannot take the heat, get out of the kitchen." Well, if you cannot take the exam without the answers, get out of the class.

Men, say 'thanks' to women

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

The long-awaited Thanksgiving break is almost here. Two more days and it will be over for a few days. After breezing through two or three major tests (the ones you spent one whole hour studying for), you can drag yourself home (to the real "home sweet home") and go into hibernation for a while.

Some things never seem to change. Every year you swear Thanksgiving Break will never get here, and when it does, you're too tired to appreciate it. It's so easy to get caught up in the wining, dining and day-after-Thanksgiving Christmas shopping that you forget how the turkey tradition started. There's more to the holiday than a great, home-cooked meal by someone other than yourself.

The Puritans started Thanksgiving back in 1620 or so. One hundred one of them left Holland and sailed for the New World, eventually landing at Plymouth Colony.

They were pretty ill-prepared once they arrived. Somebody had forgotten to bring enough groceries for the winter (incidentally, that poor soul was never heard from again). Starvation, disease and death soon followed. Of the 101 settlers, 46 died.

Those who survived soon wised up, and the following spring, with the help of some friendly Indians, the Pilgrims "went ag" and learned to plant and harvest local crops. By the fall of 1621, crops were harvested from 20 acres of corn and six acres of barley and peas. The Pilgrim men set out to slaughter all poor, defenseless, big, brown-eyed creatures that made "good hamburger." They also wanted to impress the remaining Pilgrim women with their skill and courage. The women blamed their knucklehead husbands for the previous disasterous winter. Therefore, the men needed all the brownie points they could get if they ever wanted to sleep someplace other than the couch. What the men couldn't shoot themselves, they bought from the Indians, peppered it with buckshot and hoped no one noticed the difference.

The Pilgrims were then well-provided for the next winter. Their leader suggested a special feast day to "rejoice together." An invitation to join the Pilgrims was sent to the Indian leader, Massoit. He, however, mistakenly believed the invitation to be for a festival honoring the corn goddess and decided to bring the whole tribe. When he and his 90 braves showed up, they far outnumbered the remaining band of 55 Pilgrims. So much for the prospects of leftovers for turkey sandwiches.

All of the food for the three days of feasting was prepared by the five surviving wives plus a few young girls. Everyone dined on cod, seabass, wildfowl, corn and five deer brought by the Indians. Bread, fruit and herbs rounded out the meal.

Things haven't changed much since then. Women still do all the cooking and the men do all the eating and subsequent belching. While the women clean up in the kitchen afterward with their dishpan hands, the men vanish into the living room, turn on the football game and snore the afternoon away. Surely, the Pilgrim men would've done the same if the Dallas Cowboys had played that afternoon.

Thanksgiving would be more fun for all women involved if everyone ordered out for pizza or kept it simple like Snoopy did. In "A Charlie Brown Thanksgiving," Snoopy fixed a Thanksgiving meal of ice cream, popcorn and potato chips, and no one complained too much.

What if a new Thanksgiving tradition were initiated? Let men slave in the kitchen while women watch. This would provide a lot of laughs and a lot of heartburn after the meal. If the women tire of this, they can simply pursue the usual male pre-dinner activities: checking out each other's cars, comparing the physical attributes of the opposite sex in their office, telling dirty jokes and whining "Isn't it ready yet? We're starving."

After the meal, or semblance thereof, the women could stampede into the living room and plop down in front of the television for a full afternoon of soaps and "Magnum, P.I." reruns. The men could clean the table and, in the process, run some silverware through the garbage disposal. If all else fails, they could avoid dishpan hands by letting the family dog clean off the plates. The kitchen may never be the same, but somehow, the mess would get cleaned up, and a few new cuss words would be invented.

One Thanksgiving of role reversals would ensure more appreciation of how much work is involved, for both sexes. After all, switching TV channels on a full stomach without falling off the couch isn't easy.

Job possibilities improve for business, computer industries

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

"Grown-up" life is sometimes referred to as a game. Step one: go to college. Step two: graduate from college. Step three: find a job.

It's the third step in the game of life that probably is more worrisome right now to December graduates than to other students.

Bruce Laughlin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, said the future appears to be fairly bright for most upcoming graduates.

"The industries that are showing the most interest (in hiring) right now include pharmaceutical sales. This is one company that is expanding quite rapidly," Laughlin said.

"Part of the expanding may relate to the rapid growth of drug-testing procedures throughout the country and the need for kits."

Laughlin said job offers are going to some engineers and business majors, as well.

"There's kind of an ironic need at the present time for land appraisers related to difficulties in the rural economy," he said. "Similarly, some of the government agencies having to deal with agricultural problems are doing some hiring."

Defense-related industries, although not as ambitious a year ago, are still hiring, Laughlin said.

In the 1986/87 College Placement Council Annual, it is estimated there are more jobs than candidates in the following fields of study: business and management, computer and information sciences, engineering, mathematics and physical sciences.

The annual also estimated the fields of study that have jobs equal to available candidates, including agriculture, architecture and environmental design, education, health professions and library science.

There also are several job markets for which there are more candidates than openings. Those include biological science, communications, fine and applied arts, foreign languages, home economics, interdisciplinary studies, natural resources, psychology, public affairs and social sciences.

Estimated figures appearing in the 1987 Employers' Guide to Graduates, put out by the Career Planning and Placement Center, indicate 912 students will graduate with a bachelor's degree, and 217 will receive a master's degree in December. Laughlin said 40 percent to 50 percent of the degree candidates register with the center.

"We've had around 4,400 interviews so far. Although we may not reach our 5,000 level this semester, the activity this year compares favorably with last year," he said.

"Some hopeful signs include the fact that a number of employers are making re-interview calls to the campus," he said. "They are having some second interviews with some of the students, which indicates pretty clearly that they're serious about hiring."

Some of the "big-name" interviewers that have come to K-State this fall are General Electric Co., Procter & Gamble Co., General Mills Inc., Hallmark Cards Inc. and Koch Inc., said Janet Howland, clerk at the center.

After years of struggling, women have the same employment opportunities as men do, Laughlin said.

"I think we have been successful in eliminating discrimination by sex," he said. "I think employers are eager to hire women, and in some areas that may fill a more pressing need if they are understaffed with women in tradionally male categories."

However, the 1985-1986 CPC Salary Survey stated, "In all areas of engineering, women's salaries were the same as or slightly better than men's. However, except for allied health, women received lower salary offers in all disciplines of business, humanities and social sciences and sciences."

During this time of year, some students are scheduling their interviews and visits with potential employers during their vacations.

"Employers do this by invitation and some students will do it voluntarily," Laughlin said. "This happens at Christmas as well as Thanksgiving vacations.

"This is a good time to call attention to people who have not set up appointments (to inform them) that this is a good time to be visiting so that students aren't wasteful with the their time or the employers' time."

Oil industry advocates prepare for 'big fight' over drilling in Alaska

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Battle lines are forming for what is looming as one of the big environmental fights of 1987: whether the caribou and musk oxen of northeastern Alaska will share the frigid tundra with oil rigs.

"There is a battle of monumental proportions brewing on this issue," says Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who likes to refer to the 1.5 million acres in question as "the Saudi Arabia of North America."

Beneath this land is potentially the biggest untapped U.S. oil reserve, perhaps rivaling the 9.6 billion barrels originally contained in the Prudhoe Bay field, the continent's largest.

Stevens and other development advocates say it is essential for national security that the reserve be tapped to counter a growing U.S. dependence on foreign energy supplies.

Environmental and conservation groups are calling for a permanent prohibition on drilling there by adding the 1.5 million acres to the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge, the 19-million-acre preserve just to the south in Alaska's north slope region.

The refuge, including the Brooks Mountain range, was created in 1980 when Congress passed the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. The 1.5 million acres were set aside pending a study by the Interior Department.

On Monday, the department is scheduled to release its study and tentatively suggest what action Congress should take regarding the future of the acreage — known as the Coastal Plain — that abuts the Beaufort Sea, part of the Arctic Ocean.

Last week, the issues were framed by participants in a conference organized by Americans for Energy Independence.

The Coastal Plain is bracketed with drilling successes. About 100 miles west are the decade-old fields that feed the Alaska Pipeline about 20 percent of the nation's daily production. Further east, Canadian rigs are exploiting major petroleum deposits.

In between are the Coastal Plain animals: wolves, polar bears, migratory birds, and a growing herd of 600 musk oxen whose ancestors were nearly wiped out by hunters early this century.

Environmentalists say the Coastal Plain is a critical habitat for a caribou herd estimated at between 160,000 and 200,000. It is where they breed and calve and go to find relief from swarming insects, according Jay Hair of the National Wildlife Federation.

Groups like the Sierra Club, the Wilderness Society and Defenders of Wildlife are opposed to energy development on the Coastal Plain. Hair says his group won't take a position until it sees the Interior Department proposal.

But he raised questions about air and toxic pollution from drilling activities. Hair said toxic seepage has killed vegetation for 10 acres around a waste pit at Prudhoe Bay. He added that he worries about toxics entering the food chain and being ingested by geese that are hunted and eaten.

The Coastal Plain area is home to the Inupiat Eskimos. Adam Jacobs, president of the Eskimo-owned Arctic Slope Regional Corp., feels that "energy production facilities can be developed and operated compatibly with the very important fish, waterfowl and wildlife species of the Coastal Plain. It will, however, require careful regulation and it will cost money."

Stevens told the conference that the Coastal Plain can be "developed in a way that's environmentally sound."

Impersonators appear at Cotton Club

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

Frank wasn't Frank, and Ed wasn't Ed, but their supporters at The Cotton Club Friday evening didn't really seem to care.

Frank and Ed fans waited in line at The Cotton Club, 418 Poyntz Ave., to get free Polaroid photos taken with them, and some asked for their autographs on bumper stickers. Others merely wanted to partake of Frank and Ed's product.

Frank Bartles and Ed Jaymes need no introduction to wine cooler connoiseurs. They are seen regularly on television commercials promoting Gallo's Bartles & Jaymes Premium Wine Coolers. Frank is the spokesman, while Ed has yet to utter a word.

In the local promotion, Frank Bartles was portrayed by Milt David, Manhattan resident and president of Development Planning & Research Associates Inc. Bill Avery, Manhattan resident and owner of Component Fabricators, portrayed Ed Jaymes. As Frank and Ed, the pair tended bar, posed for pictures and signed autographs.

Some local supporters said they wanted to meet the real Frank and Ed, but most were not disappointed by the promotion.

"I guess we did (want to see the real Frank and Ed), but then again it doesn't surprise me," said Jeff Payne, graduate student in chemistry. "It's a chance to get out and do something a little bit different."

The promotion was somewhat misleading, said Dave Wagner, junior in journalism and mass communications.

"I was disappointed, but it's no big deal," he said.

Although they were busy with their duties, the duo of David and Avery said they were enjoying themselves.

"(Frank and Ed) are cult heroes in a sense. Besides, this is a lot of fun," David said.

"We're just down here for a fun Friday night," Avery said. "I think some of the ads might have indicated that the real ones were coming."

The Cotton Club started running classified advertisements on the promotion in the Collegian about three weeks ago. The ads stated Frank and Ed would be in Manhattan Friday promoting the wine coolers.

In Friday's Collegian, a photo of the real Frank and Ed ran in an advertisement that was provided by The Cotton Club. However, the ads never mentioned that Frank and Ed scheduled to appear weren't the real Frank and Ed.

Ads have appeared in the Manhattan Mercury that contain a photo of the local impersonators. Larry Linbocker, manager at The Cotton Club, said if he had intended to deceive Collegian readers, he wouldn't have run the ads in the Mercury.

"If I intended to do that, I would have run (the ad with the real men) all along," Linbocker said. After receiving a life-size cutout of the real Frank and Ed, he believed the Collegian ad would be an attention-getter.

Linbocker said the inclusion of Frank and Ed look-alikes had not been authorized by Bartles & Jaymes distributors. In addition, a spokesman for Gallo Winery said the company doesn't advertise in college publications.

"We have a policy established by our winery of not advertising in college newspapers because we do not want to reach an audience whose members may be under the legal drinking age," said Dan Solomon, communications director of Gallo Winery.

In accordance with a request made by Solomon, Linbocker said he would not run a photo of the real Frank and Ed in future promotions.

Judy Goldberg, Collegian staff writer, also contributed to this story.

Professor to use turkey bones in study

By The Collegian Staff

After students and faculty have eaten their Thanksgiving turkeys this year, a professor of anthropology is requesting them to return to campus with the bones.

Mike Finnegan is asking for turkey carcass donations to assist in a comparative study of wild and domestic turkeys.

The results of research can be applied, Finnegan said, in circumstances involving forensics. For example, in court cases concerning individuals accused of shooting a turkey out of season, "we can determine whether it's wild or not," he said.

The study will involve evaluating turkey bone measurements using a discriminate-function technique, a method of mathematical analysis used to determine whether birds are male or female, wild or domestic by sorting characteristic traits.

"A larger sample makes the whole process more of an accurate predictor," Finnegan said.

The bones will be cleaned with sodium torborate to remove remaining flesh material and to bleach the bone. The bones will then be measured and recorded. Finnegan said the measurement of a bone has a different average length for wild and domestic animals.

"We've been able to adequately separate domestics from wild turkeys and also male and female turkeys," he said.

Finnegan said he currently has about 15 to 20 turkeys to work with but is hoping to receive up to 100 more of each sex after Thanksgiving.

Turkey carcass donations can be delivered to Waters 204. In order to double-check the accuracy of the technique, Finnegan is asking donators to bring in the original wrapping that the turkey was bought in. The size and sex of the turkey is sometimes identified on the wrapping label.

Governor to select chief justice; decision to shift power balance

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — With only a few short weeks remaining in his eight-year term as governor, John Carlin faces one of his most important decisions: who to select to replace Chief Justice Alfred G. Schroeder on the Kansas Supreme Court.

The nominees are Crawford County District Judge Donald L. Allegrucci of Pittsburg, Wyandotte County District Judge William M. Cook of Kansas City, and Jerry Gill Elliott, a Wichita attorney.

The choice is important for a number of reasons, including the fact that Carlin, a Democrat, can give his party a majority on the court for the first time in Kansas' 125-year history.

It will be a difficult decision because Carlin will likely encounter strong pressure from factions within the Kansas Democratic Party as he deliberates.

Lobbying on behalf of each candidate already has started, as happens with every major appointment. The attempts to influence the governor are usually indirect contacts with Carlin's appointment staff from groups which support the various nominees.

Emmissaries will phone or write Carlin's aides. Parochial loyalties will be evident as politicos in Wichita, Kansas City and southeast Kansas unite to help their compatriots.

The retiring governor will interview all three within the next two to three weeks, as soon as background checks are completed by the Kansas Highway Patrol. He must decide on Schroeder's successor before Jan. 12, or Gov.-elect Mike Hayden will get to make the plum appointment.

Allegrucci, a Pittsburg Democrat, might have a slight edge in the process because of his strong political ties and familiarity with Carlin.

Allegrucci, 50, is administrative judge of the Crawford County District Court. Carlin named him to that post in February 1982.

The two are political contemporaries and friends, dating to their years working together in the trenches when both were in the Legislature.

Allegrucci served one four-year term in the Kansas Senate in 1976-80. At the same time, Carlin was speaker of the Kansas House and, in 1978, won his first four-year term as governor.

While Carlin was winning the state's highest elected office, Allegrucci was not as successful in his efforts to advance in the political process.

First, he ran for Congress in 1978 when Joe Skubitz retired his 5th District seat but lost to U.S. Rep. Bob Whittaker, an Augusta Republican, who has since been re-elected four times.

Then in 1980, Allegrucci lost his bid for re-election to the Senate to Republican Ed Roitz.

Allegrucci graduated from Pittsburg State University in 1959 and earned his law degree from Washburn University in Topeka in 1963.

As a jurist, Allegrucci describes himself as "somewhere between moderate and liberal" and says his strength is in his "experience in every facet of the judicial system."

In his 23 years in the legal profession, Allegrucci has worked as a prosecutor, defense attorney and judge. He also sat on two special Court of Appeals panels.

"I've had satisfaction in every phase, but what I enjoyed the most was my work in the state Senate where I help mold, shape and make new law," he said in a recent interview.

Cook, 51, also has southeast Kansas ties from his days as assistant Labette County attorney, city attorney in Chetopa and probate juvenile judge in Labette County.

A native of Bonner Springs, Cook attended Washburn as both an undergraduate and a law student, graduating in 1956 and 1959.

Cook, a Democrat, has been an attorney 27 years and was appointed a Wyandotte County District Court judge in 1975. In addition, he has served on two special panels — sitting with the Court of Appeals and with the Kansas Supreme Court in July 1984.

In 1981, Cook was chosen the Kansas trial judge of the year by the trial lawyers association.

"I prefer to think of myself as moderate," Cook said. "It's hard to characterize yourself. In matters of criminal law, I'm probably more conservative."

He points to his pinch-hitting duties with the high court in 1984 as evidence of his qualifications.

"I've been exposed to more complicated litigation, more of a variety of cases in my career than either of the other two nominees," Cook said. "I've gone through the process. I've had a number of opinions published. The fact I sat with the supreme court shows I've been tested in that regard."

Elliott, who will be 50 on Nov. 25, has impressive creditials as well. Born in Fort Scott, Elliott earned both his undergraduate and law degrees from the University of Kansas, the latter in 1964.

After serving as a law clerk for federal Judge Wesley E. Brown, Elliott joined a Wichita law firm in 1966 and he was made a partner in two years later.

Twice Elliott was nominated for the federal 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver. Unaffiliated with any political party, Elliott's nominations to the federal appeals bench came in 1977 during the Carter administration and again in 1985 during President Reagan's second term.

"I consider myself intellectually honest, intellectually independent and I suppose I'd call myself moderate," Elliott said.

Women hold farms together, sociology research indicates

By MAUREEN MURPHY
Collegian Reporter

Women's diversified input into the family farm has become crucial to its survival, said Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, at a lecture Friday on "Women in Agriculture" in Union Forum Hall.

The lecture was part of the Sixth Annual Working With Families Conference, hosted by the Family Center and the College of Human Ecology.

Flora said what women have done on the farm has been crucial since the Midwest was settled.

Flora's research in Ellis County suggests the presence of female children, rather than male children, accounted for the continuation and growth of family farms. The reason for this, she said, was that the male children provided the heroic labor necessary at harvest, whereas the female children and wives provided the daily reproductive labor and alternative enterprises that kept the family farm going throughout the year.

Flora's research found that women's work was "necessary, but not necessarily valued."

"Their sense of identity was strong but wasn't valued by the farm family as they thought it should be," she said.

Flora said that when women's input wasn't recognized and appreciated, relationships crumbled.

University President Jon Wefald gave an opening address stressing the importance of the rural community in America.

"Rural America has been subsiding urban America since 1965. We can't afford to lose rural America," Wefald said. "If we lose rural America, we will be losing a great deal of the heart and soul of this republic."

In addition to Flora, speakers for the lecture included Virginia Moxley, associate dean and professor in the College of Human Ecology; Dana Jackson, co-director of The Land Institute, a non-profit educational research organization in Salina; and Ruth Ann Wefald, former assistant commissioner of economic security for Minnesota.

Moxley said women in agriculture have a challenging profession. Many times, this means raising children in poverty, living with emotionally unresponsive mates who are struggling to maintain the business and dealing with the anger and frustration of living in social isolation.

Jackson said women have certain qualities that agriculture needs.

"Women are said to have patience and the ability to handle the complexities of life, to handle all the details of family life and community life and keep everything running," Jackson said.

She said diversity was going to be important to the survival of agriculture, and the state is too dependent on wheat and beef.

Farmers who have been specialists for the past 20 years can be even better farmers by diversifying and becoming more generalists, and qualities women possess contribute to this diversity, she said. It will be important for farmers to think about different crops at different seasons.

"It's going to take the ability to handle the complexities and diversity which is attributed to women to make this happen," Jackson said. "Women want to be involved on the land as producers of food."

Ruth Ann Wefald shared her experiences in Minnesota with the Countryside Council, a citizens task force, in 1979. There was great economic disparity between what rural males and rural females were paid for different positions, she said.

The result of the task force was a center for rural women called the Career Counseling Center. She said it was a program that tried to help everyone, many with economic problems, that came through the door.

The center offered private counseling, which allowed the rural women to talk to someone in confidence, support groups and a variety of workshops. Wefald said she found many women lacked self-esteem, which the center tried to resolve through workshops.

"The unpaid work in our society is not given credit," she said. "That problem for women, that society does not deem their work as valuable, turns out to be a problem in terms of self-esteem."

The overall belief was that women's contributions to agriculture has been great, but they have not received much in return, she said.

"Since society didn't take them seriously," Wefald said, "women didn't take themselves seriously."

Chairman reacts to ad campaigns, drafts Democrats' code of conduct

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Democratic Party chairman Paul G. Kirk Jr., trying to build on 1986 election victories, said Sunday he is drafting a code of conduct aimed at keeping fractious Democrats from self-destructing on the road to the 1988 presidential campaign.

Kirk told the Democratic National Committee he would issue the code next year to "discourage negative, polarizing and party-bashing campaigns."

Party spokesman Terry Michael said the motivation for such a code was "so we can win in 1988, so we don't shoot ourselves in the foot."

Kirk was vague on what the code would include, but mentioned his wish to avoid the highly negative television ads that characterized this year's congressional races. He also referred to politicians, whom he did not name, who include criticism of the national party as part of their campaign.

Kirk indicated he was concerned that a bitter fight for the nomination could leave the party's next presidential nominee too weak to win the White House in 1988.

But the chairman conceded at a news conference after the meeting, "Let's be realistic in terms of what power of sanctions a chairman has — the best I can do probably is to set a tone."

The chairman voiced his displeasure over continued complaints about party rules. He didn't single out Jesse Jackson, but the civil rights leader has been the only prominent party figure to pursue demands that the rules be changed.

"It is not aimed at Jesse Jackson," said Michael, when asked if Kirk had a particular candidate in mind.

Kirk said past Democratic debates over party rules caused voters to tune out on what the party was saying on issues.

In proposing a code of conduct for that campaign, the chairman declined to give specifics on what form the code would take.

Last lecture opens with language professor speaking about personal views of teaching

By The Collegian Staff

The second year of the "Last Lecture" series will begin at 7 p.m. today in Nichols Theatre.

The speaker, Douglas Benson, associate professor of modern languages, has been asked to speak on a subject of his choice — with one stipulation.

"The idea of the series was taken from a similar series at the University of Kansas," said Mike Morris, sophomore in journalism and mass communications and chairman of the series. "What we do is select a professor to speak, giving him no real guidelines, just one question. 'If this were to be the last lecture before you die, what would you speak on?'"

Benson, who has been at K-State since 1980, said he will speak on his personal views on teaching, cross-cultural communication (reflecting on his experiences teaching in a culture with a different language) and a "little bit" on Central America.

Benson has had many of his personal works published, most of them dealing with contemporary Spanish poetry. He is working on a book on contemporary Spanish poet Angel Gonzalez.

In 1984, Benson received the Distinguished Undergraduate Teaching Award from the College of Arts and Sciences and was recently named a Presidential Lecturer by University President Jon Wefald.

The selection of Benson to speak in the series was made by a "Last Lecture" committee, along with input from students who expressed interest in having him as a lecturer.

Last year, there were three speakers in the series, as is planned for this year, Morris said.

Those who have spoken in the past are Max Milbourn, professor emeritus of journalism and mass communications; R.P. Coleman, professor of marketing, and John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy.

'Festival of Trees' receives $4,700 from local Christmas tree auction

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

Santa Claus came to town early this year — at least to those visiting the "Festival of Trees" organized to raise funds for Big Lakes Developmental Center.

Thirty-five decorated trees were donated for the festival by businesses, churches, greek houses and community organizations.

After being on display Friday, Saturday and Sunday at the Elks Building, Fifth and Houston streets, the trees were auctioned for a total of $4,700, said Janice Pankratz, community relations director for Big Lakes.

The festival raised more than $7,000, which will go into the general budget fund for Big Lakes, she said.

"Big Lakes is tax-supported through the federal, state and county level, but we are losing our federal and state funds," she said. "Due to budget cuts, social-service programs are going to be hurt, and this event will help to make up those losses."

Big Lakes is a non-profit, community-based organization that provides programs for the developmentally disabled. The center operates in Clay, Riley, Pottawatomie and Geary counties offering a preschool children's program, residential program and a sheltered workshop program.

Although this is the first time Manhattan has had a festival of this kind, other communities sponsor the event on an annual basis, Pankratz said.

"In Topeka, they do it for Sheltered Living, which is a residential program for mentally retarded, and for TECH in Hutchinson, which is similar to Big Lakes," she said.

"Both (festivals) are very successful," Pankratz said. "Topeka has been doing it for 10 years and makes about $60,000, and TECH has been doing it for four years and makes about $30,000.

"Interest is going to grow now that people know what it's all about. It's good public relations for businesses and organizations to show interest in the community."

The tremendous community support has prompted organizers to begin planning the event for next year, she said.

Syria, Iran transport Soviet-built warheads made of harmful gas to Libya, paper says

By The Associated Press

LONDON — A weekly newspaper said Sunday that Libya has Soviet-made nerve gas warheads and has passed some of them on to Syria and Iran.

The conservative Sunday Telegraph quoted unidentified Western intelligence sources as saying the warheads can be fired from Scud-B missiles and contain a lethal nerve agent capable of killing anyone within 25 square miles of a target.

The warheads also render a city uninhabitable for about 24 hours after an attack, the report said.

"I don't have anything on this," State Department spokesman Anita Stockman said in Washington on Sunday.

The newspaper's defense correspondent, Simon O'Dwyer-Russell, wrote that Libya supplied the nerve agents "within the last few weeks" to Syria and Iran, which operate identical Scud-B systems.

British intelligence services have "traced the source of the nerve agent back to the Soviet Union," the report said.

The Soviet Scud, also known as the SS-1, is a vehicle-launched surface-to-surface missile with a range of more than 160 miles.

O'Dwyer-Russell said Israeli intelligence knew of Syria's new weapon.

If nerve gas warheads were fired from Syria, they could devastate any city in Israel, the report said.

New ruling pleases K-State, angers Coleman

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

The National Collegiate Athletic Association made a new ruling Saturday on the eligibility status of K-State basketball player Norris Coleman. Following an appeal by Coleman, the NCAA severed in half its previous penalty against Coleman.

Coleman, who in February was ruled by the NCAA not to have been a 2.0-qualifier out of high school, had previously been ruled ineligible until Feb. 27, 1987, consequently missing 27 games.

The new ruling states that the 25-year-old Coleman will be eligible following K-State's 12th game of this season. Under the ruling, Coleman will be forced to pay back all financial aid he received from K-State during the last academic school year, K-State will have to forfeit all 16 of its wins from last season, and the Jacksonville, Fla., native will lose a year of eligibility, making him a junior this season.

Prior to Saturday's announcement, there had been much talk of Coleman seeking a court injunction against the NCAA decision. Coleman, nor his attorney, Jeff Schemmel, would verify that the legal option of an injunction was still a strong possibility, but it was clear neither were overly pleased with the ruling.

The confusion in the case had also been compounded by a number of varied interpretations concerning the Coleman ruling sent to K-State by NCAA officials.

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis said this confusion had much to do with the NCAA Subcommittee on Eligibility agreeing to rehear the appeal in the Coleman case Friday afternoon.

The original ruling forced Coleman to sit out 27 games, but the new decision cut that in half — counting the final two games of last season that Coleman sat out and the first 12 of this season. Coleman's penalty is 14 games.

If Coleman does play for the Wildcats beginning the 13th game of the season, he will be eligible for all of K-State's 14-game Big Eight Conference schedule and any postseason play for which the 'Cats might qualify.

The new ruling pleased K-State officials but angered Coleman.

"I feel the same about this as I did before," Coleman said. "What they've got proposed is nothing like what we wanted. What I proposed was I pay back the scholarship and lose a year of eligibility, but it came back that I still lose 14 games."

"The K-State athletic department is prepared to accept this decision and move forward," Travis said. "We feel that we have been treated fairly by the NCAA in this matter."

At an impromptu press conference during halftime of the K-State-Colorado football game, Schemmel would not rule out the possibility that he and Coleman still might seek a court injunction to reinstate Coleman prior to K-State's first game Saturday against South Dakota.

Schemmel said he was disappointed that the NCAA didn't further lessen the penalty against his client.

"I think he deserves better than that. The fact that he was ineligible was way beyond his knowledge and they've recognized that in the past," Schemmel said.

And that is the heart of Coleman's case. Despite the fact the NCAA originally announced that Coleman was not at fault in the matter, the NCAA penalized him if he elected to stay at K-State.

The original ruling also stated Coleman would be eligible immediately if he chose to transfer to another NCAA school outside of the Big Eight. But to the surprise of many, Coleman chose to stay at K-State and fight the decision.

Stating school loyalty and thankfulness to the K-State athletic department and basketball fans who stuck with him throughout the situation, Coleman, who last season led the nation's freshman class in scoring, shunned such basketball powerhouses as Kentucky and Maryland to remain a Wildcat.

Although Coleman would not come out and say he would be seeking a court order this week, he hinted heavily toward that option.

"I don't see what I gain from it and I don't think it's fair to the team that I come in after 12 games," Coleman said. "I'll sit down and iron things out with my lawyer and see how I stand."

Alums come home to show off talents for K-State crowd

By RON RENO

Stars of K-State's rich basketball past gathered at Ahearn Field House Saturday night to compete in the All Seasons Hotel Alumni Classic.

Some of the alumni, sporting a little less hair and a few more pounds than when they last played here, said the turnout for the event — approximately 50 former players returned to the campus — was a tribute to K-State's basketball tradition.

"I think K-State is unique," said Bob Noland, who played from 1973-76. "They have people show up from 30-40 years ago up until last year. I think it's super."

"It was good to come back and see some of the guys you played with and get to know some of the guys who played before and after you," said Carl Gerlach, who starred for the 'Cats from 1972-76. "I think the friendship and the fun was the best part of the whole night — the basketball certainly wasn't."

The outcome didn't mean that much, but the purple-alumni team defeated the white-alumni team 48-37.

K-State Coach Lon Kruger, who played for the purple squad, said, "I'm really pleased with the tremendous response by our alums and for our alums.

"I was a little slow and out of shape, but I had a really great time."

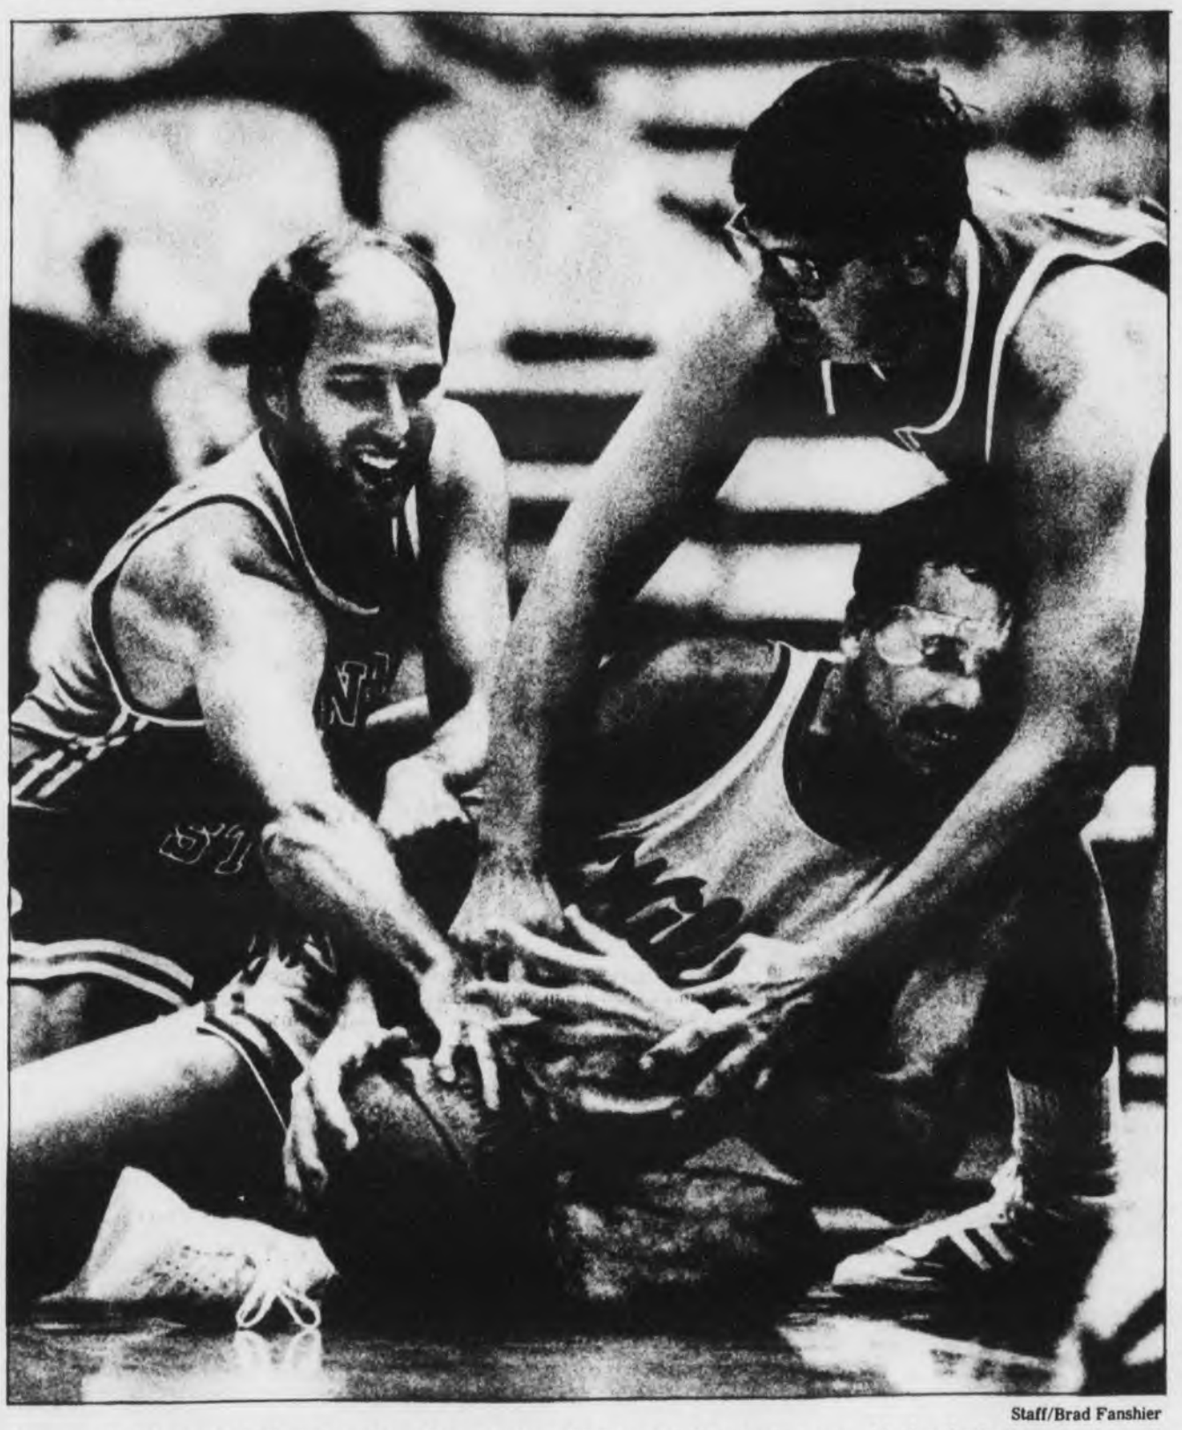
The former players, who made frequent use of the newly installed three-point line in collegiate basketball, had mixed reactions to the device.

"I think it's great. I think it adds another dimension to the game," said Steve Soldner, who played at Ahearn from 1976-79.

Ernie Kusnyer, who played for three seasons in the early '70s and is K-State's 12th all-time leading scorer, said, "It's too close. They changed a rule just to change a rule."

While opinions on that issue were divided, there was a unanimous consent regarding the selection of Lon Kruger as Jack Hartman's predecessor at the head coaching position.

"I think it was the only choice the nominating committee had," said Gerlach, who played with Kruger for two years. "I don't think there was any other choice as wise as that one.



"He coached when he was a player. He was always in control of the floor, making sure everybody was doing the right things at the right time. He helped people on the floor, and he was really an all-around player."

"K-State is going to win with him," said Kusnyer, who also played with Kruger. "He's got all the ingredients."

Following the alumni game, the current players scrimmaged one another in what Kruger called a "sluggish" performance.

The white team, which consisted of the players on athletic scholarships, easily handled the purple squad of non-scholarship players, 47-26.

K-State opens its season Saturday at Ahearn Field House with a 7:35 p.m. tip-off against the University of South Dakota.

KC's skid continues with loss

By The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Neil Lomax answered his critics the best possible way Sunday while coming off the bench to spark a victory by the lowly St. Louis Cardinals.

"The whole team played well," the sixth-year quarterback said after engineering a 23-14 triumph over the Kansas City Chiefs. "I had confidence in myself. Our team is limited in a lot of areas, but everybody played well."

Lomax, who had given way to Cliff Stoudt during a two-week hiatus, celebrated his return by passing for 185 yards and three touchdowns.

"I'd be lying if I said there wasn't some extra pressure on us all, especially me," Lomax said. "I've got a lot of faith. I had a good time. I'm no hero. I'm just going out there and doing my job."

St. Louis Coach Gene Stallings said the two-week layoff probably served as a tonic for the returning player.

"There's no doubt right now that he'll start against Washington," the coach said in reference to the Cards' game next week against the Redskins. "I haven't really thought about it yet, but he played well today."

In addition to Lomax, a rearranged St. Louis line that was juggled because of injuries drew Stallings' praise.

"They didn't really blow anybody off the ball, but they got the job done. Neil had enough time," Stallings said. "I was pleased."

Kansas City Coach John Mackovic admitted disappointment in a lackluster Chiefs showing but at the same time praised the victors.

"We obviously didn't play very well, but let's give St. Louis credit. Neil Lomax had a great game."

KU ends 'Cats' year with first-round loss

By DAVE WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson summed up quite simply his team's performance this weekend at the Big Eight Volleyball Championships at Penn Valley Community College in Kansas City, Mo.

"We competed, they competed," Nelson said after K-State's 10-15, 15-6, 15-3, 12-15, 15-13 loss to the University of Kansas in first-round action.

The meeting of the intrastate rivals was the fifth one between the two teams this season. Nelson saw that as an advantage for his team.

"We know the Kansas team well and that is a real advantage for us," he said. "In the matches we've had with them this year, it has always been close," he said before Friday's first-round action.

Nelson hoped, though, that instead of just being a close game, his team would take away a victory in the first rourd. Apparently, though, the cards that night were not in K-State's favor.

Going into the tourney ranked sixth in the conference with an overall record of 12-17, K-State drove KU, 26-8 overall, to five games. And in the end, the Wildcats lost the match by only two points.

"Coming into the match, we wanted to be more aggressive and wanted the match to be determined by power," Nelson said.

The power Nelson was hoping for apparently wasn't found until late in the match. After a first-game victory, K-State lost two games by wide margins. It wasn't until the fourth game, after being down 8-2, that the leadership of seniors Helen Bundy and Cindy Durham began playing a prevalent part. Together, the two sparked a nine-point scoring drive that carried the team into the fifth and deciding game, where match play really came alive.

In the fifth game, the two teams played with extreme intensity in what turned into a see-saw battle for the game and match victory. Things were looking up for K-State when a serving ace by junior Kristi Jacquart tied the game at 13, making for the seventh tie of the game. The ace, though, proved to be the final point the Wildcats could muster. The Jayhawks went on to win the last two points and the match.

'I thought it was an outstanding match...I'm very proud of our effort, especially the seniors.'
Coach Scott Nelson

As Nelson reflected on the team's play after the match, he said he felt they had done a fine job.

"I thought it was an outstanding match," he said. "I'm very proud of our effort, especially the seniors.

"We played tentatively in the first three games, but we played to our strength in the last two. As it turned out, KU beat us in a three-point match."

Nebraska captured its 11th consecutive Big Eight tourney title with a straight-set victory over Oklahoma Sunday.

K-State finished the season with a 2-8 conference record.

K-State ready for national competition

By TONY CARBAJO

K-State will set history in motion this morning when the men's and women's cross country teams run in the National Collegiate Athletic Association national meet in Tucson, Ariz.

The Wildcats qualified for the meet by placing second in the women's division and third in the men's race in the District Five meet Nov. 15 in Peoria, Ill.

A big difference in this morning's race from the district battle will be the drastic change in temperature. K-State raced in 40-degree temperatures in Peoria and more-frigid weather in the Big Eight Championships Nov. 1 in Manhattan. Coach John Capriotti doesn't foresee any climate changes hurting his teams' chance at national success.

"It shouldn't bother us at all," Capriotti said of today's expected 75-degree weather. "We are all looking forward to running in the nice weather. The weather is so moderate. If it were humid and hot, I would be worried. But we will be able to run in that, no problem."

The 20th-ranked men's team qualified to run in Tucson by virtue of beating out Iowa State by one point in the District Five race, claiming the third spot. The men surprised many people, including Capriotti, with their district finish after placing fifth in the Big Eight race.

The men were paced by senior Ron Stahl, who garnered fourth-place individual honors and is expected to battle for All-American honors today. All-American honors are bestowed upon the race's top 25 American finishers. Stahl, however, has been bothered by the flu and a sore throat.

"They don't have anything to lose," Capriotti said of the men's team. "They are going there to compete the best they can and see what place they get. They are surprised to be there."

The men's team will consist of Stahl, Jan Jonsson, Jim Knudsen, David Warders, Pat Hessini, Rob Hays and David Keller.

The women take a No. 9 national ranking with them into today's 5,000-meter race. They were ranked sixth last week, but fell three places after district competition.

If the women to be one of the top five teams at the meet, they will need another sparkling preformance from Chris Vanatta, who has recorded a second-place Big Eight finish and first-place District Five showing.

"We have to go out set in the race," said Capriotti, who set a women's team goal of finishing in the top six. "Chris is going to have to lead us. She has a shot at the top 10 (individual finishers). If everybody goes in and does their job, we're set."

The women will run with Vanatta, Jacque Struckhoff, Betsy Silzer, Alysun Deckert, Angie Barry, Anneli Edling and Nancy Hoffman.

"Everybody (team) there has earned their way there," Capriotti said. "You have already eliminated all the also-rans.

"We think we belong there. We know we belong at the national championships. These kids believe Kansas State should be there and I believe we should be there."

NIT tournament field narrows to eight teams

By The Associated Press

Memphis State, scandalized by the federal indictment of its former coach and by NCAA probation, moves into the quarterfinals of the early-season National Invitation Tournament on Monday night after a stunning first-round upset.

The unranked Tigers beat 20th-ranked Cleveland State 70-66 Saturday night at Memphis to reach the round of eight, against Michigan.

The big quarterfinal matchup has seventh-ranked Oklahoma at No. 5 Nevada-Las Vegas. The other games are Temple at Villanova and Texas Christian at highly regarded Western Kentucky.

Memphis State, already stunned by NCAA probation to both its basketball and football programs, received further bad news last Thursday when former basketball coach Dana Kirk was named in an 11-count indictment. Memphis State fired Kirk in September.

Both the Tigers' football and basketball teams are banned from postseason action this season.

The NIT, traditionally a postseason tournament, is holding its early-season event for the second time.

Michigan advanced with a 115-107 victory over Bradley on Friday night. Nevada-Las Vegas beat 19th-ranked Arizona 92-87, and Oklahoma downed Brigham Young 119-110 in the first round Friday night. Tim McCalister scored 44 points for Oklahoma, which trailed 53-51 at halftime.

High-school forward chooses to join 'Cats

By The Collegian Staff

K-State basketball coach Lon Kruger announced the signing of his third and final player of the early signing period Friday afternoon.

Joining the Wildcats next season will be Wylie Howard, a 6-foot-8, 210-pound forward from Boyd Anderson High School in Lauderdale Lakes, Fla.

Howard averaged 14 points and nine rebounds last season as a junior at Boyd Anderson, the same high school current K-State junior-college transfer Mitch Richmond attended.

"Wylie is an extemely good athlete who has the capabilities of putting up big numbers in terms of both points and rebounds," Kruger said. "He is from a quality basketball program. We anticipate that he will fit in very well with our program at Kansas State."

Howard will join the two other Wildcat early singees for the 1987-88 season. They are Carlos Diggins, a 6-4, 200-pound guard-forward from Butler County Community College, and Buster Glover, a 6-0, 160-pound guard from Allen County Community College.

Diggins has been rated as one of the top 10 junior-college recruits available in the nation this season.

Wildcats end season at 2-9

CU lands bowl from 49-3 drubbing of 'Cats

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State's football season, which began in August amid optimism and high hopes, ended mercifully Saturday at KSU Stadium with the Wildcats' 49-3 loss to Colorado.

Almost three months ago, after the Wildcats' convincing 35-7 season-opening victory over Western Illinois, there was talk of a winning season and even of finishing in the top half of the powerful Big Eight Conference.

Such things were not to be.

The Wildcats enjoyed only one more victory during the season, and the team simply "ran out of people and ran out of gas" towards the end of the season, K-State head coach Stan Parrish said. The 'Cats finished 2-9 overall, and their 1-6 conference mark left them at seventh place in the Big Eight.

Parrish, in his first year at the K-State helm, said he was glad the season had finally ended.

"We need to regroup and start over," he said. "The nice thing is that next September we get to start at 0-0 again."

While talk in the 'Cats' locker room after the game centered on next year, chants of "Bluebonnet Bowl" echoed from the visitors' quarters.

Colorado's victory, coupled with a Wake Forest upset of Georgia Tech Saturday, earned the Buffaloes a December trip to Houston's Astrodome to face the Baylor Bears.

After an indecisive first quarter that featured turnovers and missed field goals on both sides, the Buffaloes parlayed three second-quarter touchdowns into a 28-3 halftime lead. Colorado scored three more touchdowns in the second half of the one-sided contest.

"They overwhelmed us," Parrish said. "I'm not going to make any excuses. We got whipped. They've got a good football team and they beat us convincingly."

Colorado's wishbone attack eventually wore down the undermanned Wildcat defense and piled up 518 yards in total offense, most of which came on the ground.

On the other side of the ball, K-State was unable to establish a consistent offensive attack. Running back Tony Jordan, who had set a school single-game rushing record the previous week, was held in check. Ditto for quarterback Tim Hanson, who had a hard time locating open receivers thanks to an aggressive Colorado pass rush and outstanding coverage in the secondary.

"They're defense is just as good as the best defenses we faced all year," Jordan said. "They read and flow with the ball real good. It seemed as if they knew what we were going to run before we ran it."

Colorado, which got off to a 0-4 start before winning six of seven Big Eight games, was ecstatic after the contest. Oklahoma's defeat of Nebraska left the Buffs in sole possession of second place in the conference.

"I'm delighted with the win today," said CU head coach Bill McCartney. "We are really looking forward to playing in the Bluebonnet Bowl. We have played well all year, and I think the players are deserving of the bowl bid."

"I kept telling everyone not to give up early in the season when we were 0-4," said senior cornerback Solomon Wilcots, who picked off two passes on the day. "I knew that we had what it takes to be winners both in the Big Eight and in the country. Now, we have what we have been working for — a trip to a bowl. It feels great."

K-State's Parrish, who had never endured a losing season in his 10 previous seasons as a head coach at the high-school and collegiate level, said the experience was a humbling one.

"It was very trying for me," he said. "The good Lord has strange ways of paying you back, and he got me for all my winning in one year.

"But I think I've learned a heck of a lot from it. I think I'm a better coach, but I don't like losing one bit."

Despite the 2-9 record, team members said the attitude under Parrish has changed dramatically.

Senior defensive tackle Kevin Humphrey spoke of a "winning atmosphere" that has permeated the squad.

"It's been a disappointing season, but we're a whole lot better than our record shows," said senior Jeff Hurd, the other starting defensive tackle.

Squad members that will be returning expressed an eagerness to begin working toward next season.

"I'm ready to get started for next year," Jordan said. "I'm disappointed with what happened this year. I just wish we had another chance to go out and show everybody that we can play better."

Parrish said next year's success hinges upon a successful recruiting campaign and winning some games early in the season. Early season success would give the team momentum and confidence, ingredients lacking much of this campaign, Parrish said.

Parrish, ever the optimist, appeared undaunted by this year's disappointments.

"I said at (the beginning of the year) that we were small, we're slow, and we're not very deep," he said. "They picked us to finish last, and at least we didn't finish last. I hope they pick us second to last next year, and maybe we can move up a few more notches."

Scientists study why some people are boring

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Researchers are studying an acute social disease whose victims at one time or another afflict almost everyone around them: bores.

The scientists are looking at why are some people boring, in what ways they can be boring, and just how boring can they get. They've even established a "boringness index."

Among other things, their studies suggest that, to those who have to listen to them, people who complain about themselves and mutter trivialities are worse than people who overuse slang or try too hard to be nice.

They also found that boring conversation tends to include more questions and utterances like "Uh-huh," with fewer statements of fact or self-disclosure, than more interesting talk.

The experiments are among the first in an area that could lead to help for "chronically and excessively boring persons," the researchers wrote in the November issue of the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology.

"We're all boring sometimes and we're all interesting sometimes (but) some people are more boring than others," said Mark Leary, assistant psychology professor at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C., co-author of the report with three students.

The work may sound tedious but it's "a first step in a whole new direction that we need to know more about," said Harry Reis, psychology professor at the University of Rochester in New York.

The experiments were based on a survey of undergraduate students and analyses of brief conversations between undergraduates who had just met. More work will be needed to see if the conclusions apply to other kinds of people and situations, Leary said.

In one experiment, 42 students suggested 210 tiresome things other people do that bore them, which researchers distilled into 43 themes for a second survey of 297 students.

That survey found that the most boring behaviors were banality, such as talking about trivial or superficial things.

Hay-Aid group raises funds to bolster charity food drive

By The Collegian Staff

Hay-Aid, sponsored by the Haymaker Hall floor vice presidents, raised about $650 in its effort to help Flint Hills Bread Basket supply food to the needy this Christmas.

"Tickets were $1 a piece, and virtually all of the money came from ticket sales. So there was about 650 people who came," said Rick Ginn, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and vice president of Haymaker Hall. "There were somewhere between 150-175 people who performed.

"We made almost $100 in the first couple (of) hours. People just heard the music and came on in."

The Hay-Aid team plans to have the money raised from the talent show to Flint Hills Bread Basket by today.

Hay-Aid was strictly for charity, Ginn said. All funds raised go directly to the Flint Hills Bread Basket fund.

"There is talk being thrown around about having another Hay-Aid next year, and it would be an all-campus deal. It would get the greeks and the off-campus people involved," he said. "I'm not sure about this. It is a possibility for next year."

Survey

recommend," said Jackson, who has taught architectural and engineering courses at KU and structural design courses at Iowa State.

Jackson, who is a licensed engineer in Kansas and a registered architect in 25 states, said the three colleges have required courses in algebra, trigonometry, analytical geometry and calculus. After those courses are completed, students take classes in statics (a study of forces), mechanics and materials, and steel, wood and reinforced concrete design.

Jackson said the book being used at K-State to teach structural systems is inappropriate.

A statement listed in the appendix of the text states "Students using this book should have prior understanding of the following concepts: A-1 Statics, A-2 Mechanics of Materials."

"The book is written at a graduate-student level to be used after completion of the basic structural design courses," Jackson said.

Sidney Stotesbury, professor of architecture, is the instructor of the courses and co-author of the text used in the classes. He was unavailable for comment.

Another area mentioned in the survey results as needing improvement was in management and professional practice courses.

Lapping said a problem with the survey was that graduation dates were not asked and many of those who participated in the study may not have known about new classes added in this area.

"One thing we heard from our alumni is that while design is important, we also need business skills. In order to enhance those kind of offerings to our college, we brought on board Bob Jackson," he said.

Jackson teaches professional practice to architecture students and courses in management and marketing for interior architecture students.

Jackson said he may teach a class called Marketing Professional Services to architecture students in the spring, if funds are available.

While these courses have been added to the curriculum, Lapping said money and time do not permit the department to expand on others.

"I think we'd like to do more, but without resources, we don't have the ability to do more," he said. "We can't offer a strong architecture degree with business, liberal arts and engineering (emphasis) all in five years."

Jackson said most architects spend about 10 percent of their time in design and K-State's "design-intensive" architecture department could be improved by replacing design classes with courses more useful in professional practice.

"We need to balance the design and theory courses with some practical courses," Jackson said.

A 1981 Wall Street Journal article revealed that the majority of architects do not do design work. In one major firm, Perkins & Will, where 180 architects were employeed, only six were principal designers and about 20 performed secondary design tasks.

The bulk of staff members work with clients, make out budgets, supervise at construction sites or do technical drawings, the article said.

Jackson said that although the article is five years old, the statements still hold true.

Richard Ortiz, senior in architecture, said that when he began his nine-month internship in the spring of 1986, he realized he was not prepared to do professional work.

"After four years of design at K-State, I was eager to do that in the real world, and I found out that we don't apply what we've learned," he said. "It's all design. What we're learning is theory, rather than practical application."

Tuition

During Hayden's announcement Wednesday, he said the Regents' cuts should be systemwide, but not cut into essential services.

One option in the motion by Regent Frank Becker of El Dorado is to increase tuition at Regents institutions by 3.8 percent for the 1987 spring semester, which begins in January.

The other option is to advance a 3-percent tuition increase already approved for the fall 1987 semester and begin collecting it in January.

The 3.8-percent increase would raise tuition between $15 and $25 a semester for each student at the institutions under control of the Regents and generate $1.6 million revenue, or 13 percent of the $12.1 million by which the regents and their schools must reduce their spending.

Starting the 3-percent tuition increase next spring would raise about $1.26 million, or slightly more than 10 percent of the total being cut.

Under a motion adopted on unanimous voice vote Friday at the Regent's regular November meeting, the $12.1 million will be saved by taking 3.8 percent of each institution's budget allotment for fiscal 1987.

That translates into a $3.17-million loss for the University of Kansas, $3.06 million for K-State, $2.04 million for the KU Medical Center, Kansas City, Kan., and $1.39 million for Wichita State.

University President Jon Wefald said the proposed cuts present "a real serious problem for higher education in the state."

He also said the proposal to increase tuition was something the presidents of Regents institutions "felt might help a little bit."

Dispute

work habits)," Forbes told the city commission.

Jim Pearson, assistant city manager, who negotiated for the city, said, "A single incident would result in that person to receive a satisfactory rating, not an unsatisfactory. It would not affect his overall rating."

Hamilton said he thought the rules were too stringent.

"If someone has to remind you your hair is too long, or they don't like the why your shoes are shined, you can't get an exceptional rating," he said.

Hamilton said he had just finished being evaluated. His number of exceptional ratings fell short of the required nine to qualify him for the $300 this year.

"I got five or six exceptionals," he said. "I have no problems dealing with the grader because he was just going by the grading system."

During negotiations, the matter was considered by an independent fact-finding committee. Then, the city drew up another contract that was not acceptable to the firefighters because it included merit pay.

The city commission, at the Nov. 4 public hearing, decided to present a contract with merit pay to the firefighters.

"We don't like it, and we aren't going to sign it," Hamilton said.

The union is planning to take legal action by presenting its case to the Public Employee Relations Board.

"I think we have a good case," Hamilton said. "Had we felt we didn't have a strong case, we wouldn't pursue it."

The Manhattan Fire Department has 50 employees, with 36 of them union members.

Liberal man assembles barge to construct docks on lakes

By The Associated Press

LIBERAL — John Widener couldn't move Kansas next to the Mississippi River, so he decided to bring a little of the Mississippi to the landlocked Sunflower State.

The auto salvage dealer from Liberal has built a barge to construct docks and perform other chores on Kansas lakes and waterways.

"They've been needing this for years, that's the thing," Widener said. "There's just been nobody to do it."

The idea made most people laugh — but not the Kansas Fish and Game Commission. Widener will meet with commission officials to discuss a project for Clark County State Lake, where a pair of 80-foot fishing piers will be built. Projects also are being considered at the lakes in Scott County and near Council Grove and Coldwater.

Beam said commission officials are considering building wooden piers because the rock normally used to construct fishing piers has become scarce.

suburban village, but sent out his daughter, Katrina.

She said Enrile "is taking it very well," and added, "We've waited for this day for such a long time," referring to her father's leaving government after more than two decades.

Enrile has been widely viewed as having presidential aspirations.

"The game is over," navy Capt. Rex Robles, who is close to Enrile, said after the meeting with Ileto.

Ileto told reporters he did not think there would be "a reaction" from pro-Enrile soldiers. Asked if he would discipline officers involved in the plot, Ileto said an informal investigation was under way and that "if it calls for discipline, then we would."

Small numbers of soldiers continued to guard the government television and radio stations and palace security was at full alert.

Aquino was swept into power last February after Enrile and Ramos revolted against Marcos. Her purge of the Cabinet came after four months of tension and frequent coup rumors fueled by Enrile's criticism and by political assassinations.

Budget cuts injuring programs, Wefald says

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Governor-elect Mike Hayden's budget cuts announced Nov. 19 are a "serious blow" to K-State, University President Jon Wefald said Sunday.

"Higher education in Kansas has been underfunded now for the last five to six years," Wefald said. "This latest 3.8-percent, across-the-board cut for all of higher education really is a serious quality blow."

Hayden's cuts are an immediate attempt to restore $60 million to the state budget by July 1, 1987, Wefald said. Because the cuts follow several years of "very minimal funding," the University's available resources will be substantially drained, he said.

"It's already caught up with us and it's already injuring our academic programs," he said. "It's a very critical problem."

In order to raise the proposed $60 million, the state is cutting $24 million from the Kansas Department of Education budget for kindergarten through the 12th grade, about $13 million from the Kansas Board of Regents' budget and the remaining $23 million from all other state agencies, Wefald said.

The budget cuts were not a request from the state, but an order, he said.

"There wasn't any flexibility there at all," he said. "It was a mandate. What the state of Kansas wants is money."

Each state agency is drawing up strategies for the cuts, Wefald said. The proposals are due in the governor's office late next week and will go into effect as soon as the governor's office accepts them.

At K-State, funding for instructional programs will be cut about 2.3 percent, while cuts to other state-funded programs will range up to 3.8 percent, Wefald said.

"What we decided as a staff was that our instructional programs had to be the highest priority," he said. "We believe that the instructional area is the heart and soul of the University, so we want to maximize our service to the students."

Suggestions currently before the Regents concerning release of encumbered funds and tuition increases will, if granted, be used to further cushion the impact on educational programs, he said.

Currently, no plans exist to cut classes from the spring semester schedule, Wefald said.

"The most important thing is that we've singled out the colleges and instructional programs for 2.3 percent (cuts)," he said.

The cuts should not affect faculty or administration positions at K-State either, he said.

Hayden "indicated that he thought the cuts could be made without cutting personnel, and that's true here, too," Wefald said.

Lowered thermostats and reduced purchases of supplies are two areas where budget cuts will be felt, he said.

Some of those cuts could cause "permanent and irreparable damage" to the University, Wefald said.

One example is instructional equipment, which has been underfunded for several years, he said.

"Now to have to take a 3.8-percent cut, it really means in many areas that we won't be buying any instructional equipment," Wefald said.

Other measures being implemented are closing the University except for "absolutely essential" services over Christmas break, rescheduling spring evening classes into fewer buildings and delaying the use of classroom and office air conditioning until June 1, 1987, he said.

Further spending after reductions will be deferred until the post-July 1 period when the new Legislature convenes, Wefald said.

But after that, the situation may not improve.

"It doesn't look like there's going to be too much in the way of revenue for the next legislative session either," he said.

TV series erroneous, groups say

By KIM GREENWOOD

Christians, Jews, Moslems and the National Endowment for the Humanities — all of the United States — are protesting parts of the television series "The Africans," which is the basis for a telecourse offered through Continuing Education.

According to a letter from the K-State Muslim Community Association directed to Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, it stated, "In those parts of the 'The Africans' that we have had the opportunity to see, (the film series) is quite erroneous and has no foundation whatsoever in any authentic source of Islamic teachings that we are aware of."

The series, filmed in 16 countries of Africa, is the basis of classes in about 150 universities in the nation.

Jews complain that Israel is portrayed in a bad light in the series. Israel assisted South Africa, and the Jews think the series implies they condone apartheid, Ottenheimer said.

Christian missionaries think the series shows their activity as exploiting Africa, he said.

"The current controversy over a public television series about Africa tells as much about American attitudes as the series does about Africa," said John McCormally, syndicated columnist of the Harris News Service.

The guidelines of NEH demand balance and objectivity when requesting funds to underwrite a project, said Lynne Cheney, chairman of NEH, in a letter to the president of the Washington Educational Telecommunications Association

Officials say profit from Iranian sales aided air operation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A fired White House aide apparently used profits from Iranian arms sales to build a small, American-manned air force that delivered weapons to Nicaraguan Contra rebels this year, according to U.S. government officials and documents from the operation.

Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, fired last week for his role in diverting as much as $30 million through Swiss bank accounts, had managed a broader Contra aid network for two years with President Reagan's approval despite a congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the rebels, White House officials have said.

Although that assistance enabled the Contras to continue fighting, the rebels still had trouble resupplying troops operating inside Nicaragua. One government source said Sunday that problem may have led North to create an air resupply wing for the Contras — and turn to money from the Iranian arms sales to pay for it.

In explaining North's firing from the National Security Council staff last Tuesday, Attorney General Edwin Meese III said only North "knew precisely" about the Iran-Contra connection and his boss, national security adviser John Poindexter, who resigned, "did know that something of this nature was occurring."

But congressional investigators have begun examining how an operation as large as the Contra air resupply mission, based at El Salvador's Ilopango military airport in clear

Dole implores Reagan to call special session of Congress next week

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Republican leader Bob Dole on Sunday urged President Reagan to convene a special session of Congress to appoint a Watergate-style committee to investigate secret White House arms sales to Iran and money transfers to Nicaraguan rebels.

Dole, R-Kan., said he wants the president to "call a special session of Congress next week and form this select committee."

Sen. Robert Byrd, the Democratic leader of the Senate who will assume Dole's post as majority leader when the new Senate comes in next year, also called for a select joint committee, but he said it "would have to wait until Congress reconvened" in January.

He said that calling a special session would "contribute to the crisis

A bill that would have allowed the student body to vote on the Student Senate representation enhancement issue was vetoed by Student Body President Steven Johnson last Tuesday.

The bill, passed by Senate at its Nov. 20 meeting, called for the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum, which would have presented the issue to the students for a decision.

"This bill was passed narrowly by Senate in its last meeting," said Johnson, junior in agricultural economics. "I continued to contemplate the issue, and last Tuesday, I finally decided to veto the bill.

"I feel there still are important aspects to consider before the issue should or need be brought to a referendum."

Johnson said he likes the way the representation is being handled now, but there could be improvement. His concern on the issue of presenting the bill to the student body was the importance of his decision.

"I decided not to pass it on to the referendum because I was afraid that if it would be voted down there, then we would just forget the whole thing," Johnson said. "It is a quite strong bill proposing a quite dramatic change in the current com-

Title: Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum.

Sponsored by: Lee White, Candy Leonard, Martin Monto, Eirene Tatham, Sally Howard.

Whereas Kansas State University is at a crossroads concerning its mission and goals, and

Whereas Student Senate is charged with representing KSU students on a number of universitywide issues affecting a diverse range of needs and interests, and

Whereas this representation may be enhanced through revisions to the current method of electing student senators, and

Whereas representation by living district (greek, off-campus and university housing) has a record of workability on other comparable campuses, and can be feasibly implemented at KSU, and

Co-sponsors of the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum are upset about the presidential veto of their bill.

Lee White, senior in journalism and mass communications and a non-senator who originated and co-sponsored the proposal, is concerned that students might not have an opportunity to decide how they want to be represented. The bill was vetoed by Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics.

"I think our Student Senate believes in democracy, and I wish our student body president did, too," White said.

"Initially, I was very disappointed because I thought the veto meant the issue was going to be dropped, and that was the last thing I wanted to see," said Candy Leonard, co-sponsoring student senator and junior in home economics and mass communications.

"Apparently, Steven (Johnson) wanted a more thorough look at all the alternatives, which the sponsors would have been able to do as our own task force had he brought this to us a month ago when it appeared on the Senate floor," Leonard said.

"It's my personal feeling that this needs to be handled at least by election time so that we can get a fair, representative vote from the students on the issue, which I think should be the goal of Student Senate," she said.

Ship workers exposed to asbestos

BOLOGNA, Italy — Researchers say millions of seamen may have been exposed to high levels of asbestos, a cancer-causing agent found everywhere on ships from boiler room insulations to toasters in the galley.

"We have known for a long time what happened to people who made the ship and were exposed to asbestos," said researcher Irving Selikoff. "But once the ship left the shipyard, we closed our eyes."

Selikoff was one of 75 people attending a four-day conference on industrial safety that included private working sessions dealing with the subject of asbestos exposure. The conference, organized by the Collegium Ramazzino, a research group Selikoff founded, ends today.

Asbestos releases airborne fibers that can lead to a variety of ailments, including lung cancer and asbestosis, or scarring of lung tissue.

The fire-retardant material has been commonly used aboard ships since 1900, not only for insulation, but also in paint, tiles, furniture and even bunkroom blankets.

For the last five years, Selikoff has studied the effects of asbestos on thousands of seamen in the United States.

Western Kansas plane crash kills 1

COLBY — A small plane carrying three Kentucky men crashed in freezing drizzle south of this small northwestern Kansas town Sunday, killing one man and injuring another, authorities said.

A third man walked away unharmed.

The 1976 Cessna 177 RG crashed about 4½ miles south of Colby at 1:05 p.m., said Thomas County Undersheriff Scott Ekberg.

"It bellied into some grass on the edge of a farmstead, continued into a tree belt and came to rest in the trees," he said.

The victim was identified as Donnie G. Yaden, 37, of Stanford, Ky. Passenger Dave Ruda, 41, of Danville, Ky., was not injured and walked to a farm house about 300 feet away, Ekberg said.

The pilot, Lonnie Statham, 42, also of Danville, was listed in critical condition at a Colby hospital.

"Our initial impression is (poor weather) is what probably caused the crash," Ekberg said.

Bank may reopen after 2-year halt

OMAHA, Neb. — American Savings Co., which went into Chapter 11 bankruptcy nearly two years ago, may reopen soon, an attorney representing depositors said.

The institution must obtain $100,000 in federal insurance for each account before it can reopen. The company has applied for insurance coverage, and last week three federal examiners came to Omaha to check the company's records.

Attorney Deborah Cunningham said she believes the records check should enable American Savings to reopen soon.

"We cannot see why there should be any problem," said Cunningham, who represents the creditors committee in the bankruptcy proceedings.

John H. "Jack" Vaughn, president and owner of American Savings, said the federal examiners estimate that it could take a month to six weeks to reach a decision on the insurance coverage.

The examiners will report to the Federal Home Loan Bank System's district staff in Topeka. After the district staff makes its recommendation, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board in Washington will decide whether to grant the insurance coverage.

Reagan to initiate security changes

WASHINGTON — President Reagan is secretly implementing a sweeping overhaul of the nation's defenses against foreign spies that calls for more than 100 security changes from the doors of defense plants to communications satellites in space, White House and congressional officials say.

The changes will affect people as well as hardware. The 4.2 million Americans with access to secret data will face tougher and more frequent background investigations. New restrictions may be placed on the ability of Soviet bloc diplomats to buy computers and telecommunications equipment on the open market in this country.

The changes are the product of studies begun by Reagan's National Security Council staff in 1981, and consultations throughout the government and Congress.

But the "Year of the Spy" — a record 13 spy arrests in 1985 beginning with the Walker family spy ring in the Navy — galvanized Reagan and the Congress into acting on those studies now, according to a White House official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Americans favor jobs over money

NEW YORK — Most Americans like their jobs and think they're paid fair wages, but the paycheck is not the most satisfying thing about work, according to a Media General-Associated Press poll.

When asked what they liked best about their jobs, more people said "the work itself" or "the people I work with" than said they liked the money best.

About seven in 10 of the 1,464 adults in the nationwide telephone poll said they worked outside the home, and nine in 10 said they liked their jobs.

Sixty-three percent of the workers said they were paid fairly, while 29 percent said they were paid less than they deserved. Seven percent thought they were paid more than a fair amount, and 1 percent didn't answer.

Among black workers, only 44 percent said they were paid a fair wage, while 51 percent said they were paid less than they deserved. Nearly three-quarters of white workers said they were paid a fair wage.

Among those who liked their jobs, one-third said it was the work itself they liked best. About one-quarter said their co-workers were the most pleasant thing about work, and 12 percent said it was the money. The rest cited other reasons.

Among those who disliked work, 42 percent were dissatisfied with the money, 21 percent wanted a greater chance for advancement, and 15 percent disliked their boss.

Report finds fault in DWI statistics

WASHINGTON — National statistics on drunken driving and fatal accidents are inaccurate because police let most drivers leave the scene without being tested for alcohol abuse, according to a new study released Sunday.

The report by the Crime Control Institute, a non-profit research organization of law enforcement officials, found that many drunken drivers in fatal accidents are escaping prosecution because they aren't given a blood-alcohol test.

Of the 32,000 drivers who survived accidents involving fatalities in 1984, more than 75 percent left the scene without being tested for alcohol abuse, said the report. More than 25 percent of the 25,582 drivers who were killed in accidents were not tested for blood alcohol concentration. Overall, only 45 percent of all drivers in fatal accidents are tested for alcohol abuse.

Aquino criticizes Marcos for underrating her power

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines — President Corazon Aquino said Sunday the men who doubt her ability to govern are just big talkers and called her predecessor, Ferdinand E. Marcos, "not the last to pay" for underestimating her.

In other developments:

—The Communist Party said that despite a cease-fire agreement with the government, "revolutionary armed struggle" remains its main goal, and the armed forces chief called on his troops to remain vigilant during the truce.

—Police stopped about 3,000 leftists en route to the presidential palace to demand justice in the slaying of their leader, Rolando Olalia.

—10,000 Aquino supporters rallied to urge adoption of a proposed constitution.

Aquino told the women's club of the Asian Development Bank, "It has often been said that Marcos was the first male chauvinist to underestimate me. He was not the last to pay for that mistake."

She called others who have challenged her in recent weeks "a crop of garrulous men with better and brighter ideas on how to run my government....I would like to think that I have managed to have the last word and the last task of having to put things back in order after these men were finished."

A week ago, Aquino demanded resignations from all Cabinet ministers after word that a planned coup by officers close to Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile had been foiled.

Reagan blames press for captives in Iran

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — President Reagan in an interview published Sunday called Lt. Col. Oliver North, who was fired last week, "a national hero," and said the press must "take responsibility for what they have done" in revealing arms sales to Iran.

The president was quoted by Time magazine as saying he had "a bitter bile in my throat these days" because of the controversy set off by disclosure of the sales. Although the outcome was disappointing, he said, "I don't see anything I would have done differently."

The president referred to critics as "sharks, circling like they are now with blood in the water" and specifically lambasted the news media.

"What is driving me up the wall is that this wasn't a failure until the press got a tip from that rag in Beirut and began to play it up. I told them that publicity could destroy this, that it could get people killed. They then went right on," said magazine quoted Reagan as saying.

The U.S. connection to Iranian arms sales was first revealed by Al-Shiraa, a pro-Syrian Lebanese magazine, on Nov. 4, Election Day in the United States. Reagan said he did not know that profits from the arms sales were being channeled to rebels fighting Nicaragua's Sandinista government until Attorney General Edwin Meese began an investigation.

Reagan said Meese briefed him last Monday, and he decided to release the results of the probe immediately. National Security Adviser John Poindexter resigned on Tuesday and North, a Marine officer who worked for Poindexter, was fired.

Reagan said Meese's investigation is proceeding.

Poindexter, Reagan said, followed Navy tradition by taking responsibility "even if you are asleep in your bunk when your ship runs aground."

"Lt. Col. North was involved in all our operations: the Achille Lauro, Libya. He has a fine record. He is a national hero," Reagan said. "My only criticism is that I was not told everything."

The president said the Iranians approached the United States, saying they were trying to "do something" about terrorism. "We said that if they were really sincere, then they could show us by getting the hostages released."

"We got three people (hostages) back. We were expecting any day to get two others. The press has to take the responsibility for what they have done," Reagan said.

He added, "This whole thing boils down to a great irresponsibility on the part of the press." He did not single out any U.S. media outlets.

Reagan said that he believed that the Iran revelations would not hurt his presidency and called the tempest a "Beltway bloodletting," referring to a highway that runs around Washington.

"The frenzy in the Congress is not unusual for them. This will not paralyze the government. It will make it more difficult for me, yes. But I still would have risked it," said Reagan.

He added, "Frankly, I believe that as the truth comes out, people will see what we were trying to do was right. I'm not going to back off — I'm not going to crawl in a hole."

Scholarship, loan requests available

Activities to focus on student finances

By MARTHA SCHAEFER
Collegian Reporter

Financial Aid Week begins today with representatives scheduled to be in the Union today and Tuesday from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. The representatives will answer questions from students about financial aid.

The week is designed to "encourage students to pick up scholarship applications and find out what the deadlines are for applying for scholarships and financial aid," said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance. "We will also be there to answer any questions a student might have regarding financial aid."

There also will be a video tape in the Union regarding loans and debt management, and representatives from the Office of Student Financial Assistance will talk with students, Viterna said.

In the past, the financial aid information period has lasted only one or two days. In order to make Financial Aid Week a full week, the remaining three to four days will be used to encourage students to come into the financial aid office and get additional information about scholarships and student loans, Viterna said.

"The purpose of the week is to touch base with returning students about their loans, go over procedures that students need to follow to reapply for a loan and answer special questions a student may have relating to him or herself," said Cleta Raine, student financial assistance office manager.

Raine said students need to come into the financial aid office before Christmas break and pick up loan and scholarship applications to begin filling them out.

Many students do ot realize that they need to reapply for financial aid every year, Viterna said. The reason for this is a family's financial condition could improve or worsen in a year, making the student eligible for more or less than in the past.

Students who think they are not eligible for loans should go ahead and apply, Raine said.

"We find a lot of times students that are eligible for aid have never applied because they didn't think they would be eligible. It would be wise for them to come in and apply."

The deadline for applying for scholarships is Jan. 15 and March 15 for all financial aid.

For high-school students entering college next year, there will be a Telenet broadcast Jan. 8 from the Union Big Eight Room. It will be broadcast to 37 Telenet sights across Kansas to inform students about scholarships and loans. The broadcast will cover loan applications as well as changes in the law concerning loans, Viterna said.

County traffic tickets to include extra $28 fee

By The Collegian Staff

Motorists receiving tickets for violations in Manhattan will soon be shelling out an additional $28.

The $28 fee will be added to all tickets, other than parking violations, issued by the Riley County Police Department.

The fee applies to tickets paid in person or mailed, according to a spokeswoman from the Manhattan's city clerk's office, and will be the same if the ticket is contested in municipal court.

The fee applies to the violator and not to the number of tickets issued at the same time. For example, if a violator receives two tickets at one time, fees will total $28, not $56. However, the rule does not apply to tickets issued at different times to the same violator.

Curt Wood, city finance director, said the fee was initiated to offset the cost of an additional court clerk the city hired.

"The city needed a different source of revenue," Wood said. "If there wasn't a court cost, then there would be an increase in property taxes.

"The city commission decided on the user fee instead of a general tax increase."

The law took effect Nov. 14 after approval by the commission and publication in The Manhattan Mercury, the city's official newspaper.

The fee is expected to generate funds of about $30,000 annually.

Wood said the new city clerk position will cost about $15,000. The balance of the new revenue is to be deposited into the city's general fund, which, among other items, pays for municipal court and court administration costs.

Local man pleads not guilty to kidnapping, rape charges

By The Collegian Staff

District Judge Jerry Mershon entered pleas of not guilty on behalf of Nordell Glover, 42, of Randolph, as he stood mute at his arraignment Monday in Riley County District Court.

Glover, whose bail was raised from $75,000 to $100,000 by Mershon, was arrested Oct. 29 in connection with the alleged kidnapping and sexual assault of two University students.

Glover was formally read the charges against him Monday. He is charged with two counts of rape, two counts of aggravated kidnapping, aggravated sodomy, aggravated battery and aggravated sexual battery.

Glover's trial date is set for Feb. 2, 1987 in Riley County District Court, Division 2.

Bennett to implement student loan proposal

On Nov. 19, Education Secretary William Bennett unveiled a long-range plan to end federal subsidies of college loans.

Bennett said escalating tuition can be blamed on the government's willingness to pick up part of the cost of student loans.

"The heart of the matter is that colleges raise costs because they can, and a very important factor in that ability to raise costs has been the availability of federal aid in the current form," Bennett said during the announcement.

Bennett's proposed plan calls for "income-contingent" student loans. Students will pay a higher interest rate on federally backed loans and, in turn, be allowed to schedule repayment of the loans according to their income upon graduation. The interest rate will be based on the rate of 91-day Treasury bills (currently at 5.34 percent), plus 3 percent.

Repayment of the loans would not begin until nine months after graduation. The payments would be between $20 and $50 per month for the first two years after graduation and never exceed 15 percent of adjusted gross income.

"Rather than fitting his career to his payments, let him fit his payments to his career," Bennett said.

The feasibility of the plan will be tested next fall in a five-year, $5 million pilot program at 10 colleges yet to be selected.

Bennett said he is sending letters to the presidents of all 3,331 U.S. colleges and universities asking them to apply for for participation in the experiment.

It is hard to predict how the outcome of "income-contingent" loans would affect higher education in the long-run. Concrete results will not be known until after the five-year test.

Bennett admits the plan will mean graduates with low-income jobs will end up paying more than before through smaller payments spread over a longer period.

If the pilot program is a success, however, and "income-contingent" loans are implemented, colleges will be given another reason to search for ways to keep tuition costs down, rather than pass further increases on to students.

Universities, in part, have relied on the current form of financial aid to stay in business. With "income-contingent" loans, universities will have to be run as a business and fix tuition at an affordable price, because students will think twice if they really need the loan or can even afford to attend college.

The future of student loans is likely to change. Officials here should do all they can to see that K-State is one of the universities chosen for the pilot program. The program would allow the University to be prepared for a possible change in the entire structure of student loans.

Education could help hysteria about AIDS

The official projections concerning the next five years of the AIDS epidemic is 179,000 deaths and 270,000 cumulative cases of AIDS. Many experts agree that even these figures are low.

This disease threatens millions of sexually active Americans regardless of age, gender, race or place of residence. AIDS is passed along during sex or in the exchange of blood. It silently invades the genetic core of specific cells in the immune system, opening the way for many types of infections. There is no known cure.

AIDS is becoming a social and medical crisis and some of the best scientific minds in the United States believe it may become a national catastrophe.

Many Americans remain confused about this disease, and ignorance only increases the problem. However, education is one of the few tools available to fight the epidemic.

A sex education campaign concerning AIDS is ardently supported by medical experts, but there are many problems. For this education campaign to work, it would have to convey a blunt message about vaginal and anal intercourse to school-age children.

Many parents are bound to object to this type of sex education in schools, and school officials are likely to concede to their protests. This has been the case with any type of sex education in schools.

Sex education, if taught by competent authorities, would be beneficial to children. Education always is better than ignorance. Children who do not learn about sexual matters in school will learn from their peers or other misinformed sources.

Sex education is important because it erases the ignorance that has the potential to cause negative effects. When a disease such as AIDS, which can be transmitted by sexual contact, is reaching epidemic conditions, ignorance can be fatal.

Governments intrude on freedoms

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

For sometime now, I've bothered my head with that mysterious concept familiar to all, the institution that intrudes where it is not wanted and cries for money. I'm speaking of the State. What is this thing we call the State? What is the nature of such an institution that can bully us into action and simultaneously convince us that we act of our own volition?

"Surely you jest," my patriotic friends tell me. "You have merely to consult the great thinkers for answers to such simple questions as these." And so I did. I read Machiavelli and Hobbes, who worshipped the State. I read Locke, Paine and Rousseau, who distrusted the State but ultimately gave in to it. I consulted Marx, who viewed the State as a useful tool.

Still unsatisfied, I read the writings of men who are never mentioned among the names of the great thinkers. It was from these men — Peter Kropotkin and Mikhail Bakunin — that I began to get some answers. It was Kropotkin and Bakunin who denounced the State for what it is — a conspiracy.

Already I hear the rustling of a thousand or more patriotic eyebrows raising in disbelief. Already I hear the crowd abuzz: "Who is this sophist who dares to defame the divine origin of the State? Who rejects the Hobbsian notion of a voluntary social contract between quasi-historical entities known as the State and the People? Who dares to contradict the laws of nature, which proclaim some will dominate and some will be dominated?"

I do, that's who. The same person who seeks to separate church and state ignores the State's claims to a divine origin. The same person who has never voluntarily agreed to a social contract rejects the metaphysics of Hobbes. The same person's sense of equality revolts at the natural laws cited by members of the ruling classes to further their interests at the expense of others.

If I command my neighbor to do something and point a gun at her head, then I am ostracized by society as a criminal. It makes no difference if my intentions are good or bad — it is my use of force that society condemns. But let an agent of the State do the same and he or she is rewarded with a salary derived from our money.

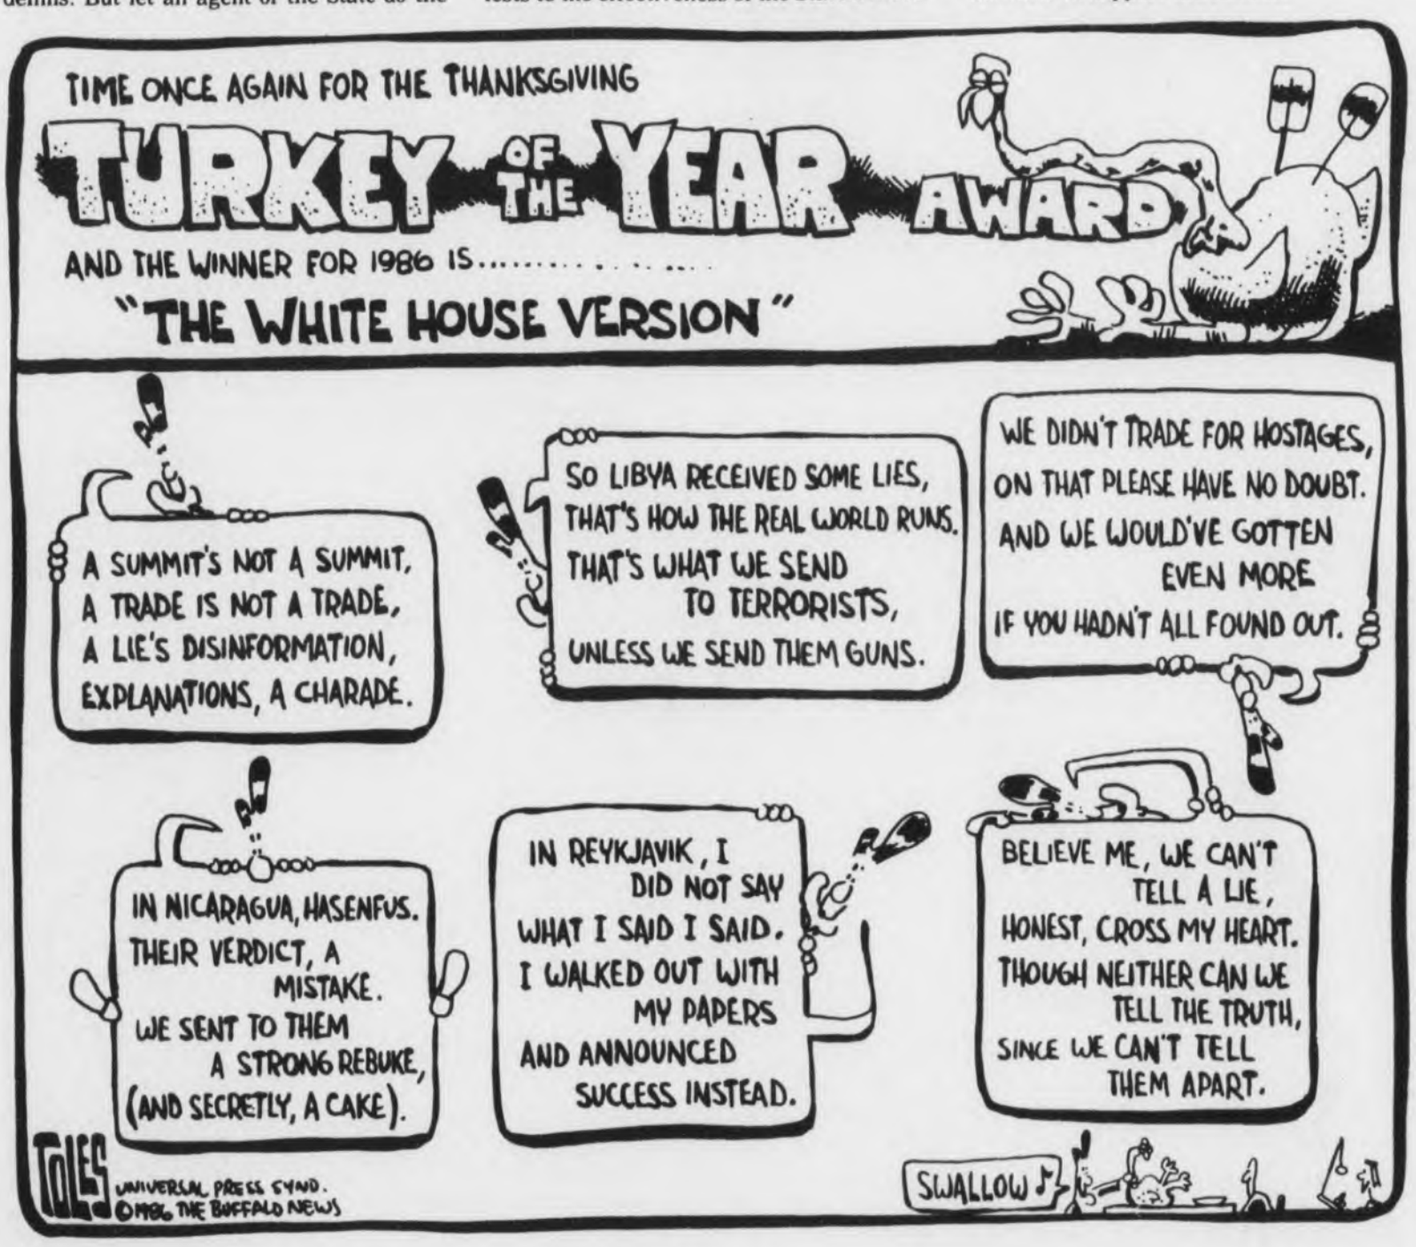
And what of that tax money? According to Hobbes, I voluntarily give up certain liberties (the right to retain money apparently being one of them) and in return I receive protection, courtesy of the State. But if this were truly a voluntary agreement and should I decide not to pay the State's ransom money, then, logically, the State would ignore me and allow me to live at my own risk.

Instead, the first person to knock at my door demanding money is not a common criminal from whom the State will no longer protect me, but rather an agent of the State itself. This person will demand I pay my taxes; this is no request or suggestion. If that were the case, I would consider the State's agent no more bothersome than a member of the Mormon Church peddling his wares door to door.

"But what of the good performed by the State?" you ask. "Does it not pave the roads, clean the water and educate the children?" If so, it does a rather poor job of it. To pave a road may cost a million dollars, but to pave a road and pay the salary of the bureaucracy that oversees the project, all the while knowing nothing about it, costs an infinite amount more.

And what of the token good performed by the State in the name of education? It is here that the State works its greatest magical powers of conspiracy. From day one, children are indoctrinated to worship the State, its symbols and its leaders. The very fact that they will not question this form of mass hostage-taking, known as the State, attests to the effectiveness of the State's indoctrination campaign.

Enter the concept the political scientists euphamistically call "legitimacy" — what is more accurately called conspiracy. Whereas the individual can destroy the lives of 10 or even a hundred innocent individuals and be branded a terrorist for doing so, the State can murder a thousand times as many innocent people. And by invoking the sacraments of national security or strategic interests, it will never once call its "legitimacy" into question.



When a terrorist group effectively dominates a population, it is bestowed with "diplomatic recognition" and suddenly — contrary to everything the biologists tell us about the impossibility of spontaneous generation -- a State is created. So extensive are the State's conspiratorial powers that the people do not question its "right" to dominate and destroy, but actually approve of such acts when they would condemn their neighbor for doing the same.

Education is often espoused as the process by which we are prepared for a productive life in society. We must be taught what is appropriate and inappropriate, what is moral and immoral. Yet, never once are we warned about the greatest perpetrator of immorality — the State. In no way are we prepared to deal with the large-scale knavery and murder employed by the State.

Instead, we are taught to accept and respect it. Beware the false prophet who calls this education. We were not educated; we were robbed. First, perhaps we should demand that the State refund the money we paid for education and, second, refuse to pay one penny more until grade-school children are taught the true nature of the State.

The fourth grade is not too soon to teach Bakunin, Proudhon or Tolstoy. It is precisely because such ideas are left for the university students to discover on their own that the masses are so willing to swallow the State's unfounded claims to legitimacy.

Someone once said that the State is a necessary evil. I submit that there is much evidence for the latter half of this contention, but little to support the former.

On pets, men, Christmas vacation

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

After a long (by the calendar), but short (in terms of rest and relaxation) vacation, it's too early to get into the "swing" of things. In other words, the minds of both writer and reader won't be functioning at their usual 75 percent capacity until late Wednesday. With that in mind, let's start with some entertaining odds and ends.

A recent article in the Chicago Tribune reported that Americans are less likely to hit their pets than they are to hit their kids. A survey of 320 pet owners in Rhode Island found that 95 percent seldom or never hit their pet. In contrast, a survey pertaining to corporal punishment showed 84.4 percent of parents had physically disciplined their 3- and 4-year-old children.

There must be some obvious reason for this. Maybe it has to do with the fact that, while most dogs prefer to do their "upchucking" on the carpet, most children take great pride in spitting up all over mom and dad. I, for one, prefer cleaning up the rug to being drenched with the fragrance of "Eau de Gerber's Pureed Sweet Yams." It doesn't wash out as well.

Children turn on you in public, throwing tantrums and going to great lengths to embarrass you. Pets usually vent their frustrations in private when the house is all theirs to chew up as they see fit.

Dogs and cats can be somewhat pardoned for their naughtiness; after all, they don't know any better. Children, although they supposedly do know better, delight in repeat offenses. Maybe these pet-owner parents have enough patience to "forgive and forget" when it comes to accidents in the house or housefuls of shedded hair, but don't have the infinite patience required for childrearing. It's too bad they didn't realize that before they had them in the first place.

Another recent article in the Wichita Eagle-Beacon stated that "untamed single males (are) dangerous." George Gilder, author of "Men and Marriage," claims that single men are far more prone than married men to drugs, violence, accidents, disease and mental breakdowns. According to Gilder, "They are interested only in short-term gratification." And they say there's no truth left in journalism!

Gilder goes on to argue that "men are, by nature, barbarians and they need women to 'tame' them." That "taming" can only be accomplished by marriage. "In marriage, a man sacrifices his barbaric self — namely his multiple sexual relationships — in favor of long-term goals such as raising children."

On campus issues, I had a great (or so I thought) idea over Thanksgiving break. Why not do away with the three weeks of school following Thanksgiving and move right into Christmas week? This innovative idea would save fuel by doing away with one trip home and back and would do away with all that dead-week and finals-week stress. There wouldn't be enough time on the calendar to schedule finals, so they'd simply have to be dropped. Oh well, that's life.

Most important, by moving up Christmas by three weeks, retailers could set up their Christmas merchandise displays on the Fourth of July instead of waiting until Labor Day like they do now. Then we could all be broke that much sooner.

I'm really beginning to like this idea. I usually get excited over the totally unrealistic ones, like straight A's and more than enough money to make it through the semester. Now, there's another great idea — a revision of the student financial aid process. Rewrite the whole thing in four easy questions: 1. Do you need money? 2. How much do you need? 3. How much do you want? 4. Do you need a new stereo, video cassette recorder, compact disc player or any other non-necessity of life? If the answer to question No. 4 is "yes," no money should be awarded. If the answer is "no," the amount to be awarded should be somewhere between the answers to questions two and three. That should make most everyone happy.

Foreign students to take English test

By The Collegian Staff

International students wanting to be graduate teaching assistants must take a TSE (test of spoken English) before they can become a GTA.

"Complaints about foreign GTAs are the reason for the testing," said Enid Cocke, director of continuing education sponsored projects. "The complaints were taken to the Legislature, which in turn informed the Board of Regents to set up a uniform standard testing, which is what the TSE is."

The TSE, administered by the Educatonal Testing Service, is a test of speech consisting of grammar, pronunciation and the degree of fluency and is used to find the student's overall comprehensive ability. The lowest passing score is 220 out of 300. No longer is there any provisional status required as there was for the first year of testing, Cocke said.

"The Board of Regents have ruled that no foreign GTA can have any student contact without passing this test," she said.

So far, 13 students have signed up to take the test. The deadline for signing up is Wednesday.

The TSE will be given at 4:30 p.m. Friday and 10:30 a.m. Jan. 6, 1987. Both tests will be in Eisenhower 26. Students may take the examination on either test date but not both.

Prospective GTAs needing to take the test should register for one of the test times at the English Language Program office.

Using fake I.D. can lead to fine, jail sentence

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

The users of false identification and those who furnish it can face a tough penalty, regardless of their age or the situation in which they try to use fake identification cards.

Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department said to use or to knowingly permit the use of fake identification is a serious crime. The punishment for such crimes extends from a class B misdemeanor, which includes using or permitting the use of a false I.D., to a class E felony, for those who deal in false documents.

The class B misdemeanor carries a $1,000 fine and/or up to a six-month jail term. The class E felony has a $10,000 fine and/or a one- to five-year sentence.

A class A misdemeanor is imposed on any person who uses or knowingly permits the use of any identification to a person under 21 years of age in order for them to obtain alcohol. The same penalty is imposed on those who try to obtain cereal malt beverage and are under the legal age. The class A misdemeanor also applies to those using or lending a false I.D. in order to obtain a new or a duplicate identification card.

The class A misdemeanor carries up to a one-year jail sentence and/or $2,500 fine.

Woodyard said the problem of fake I.D.s "is not one of major magnitude" in Manhattan but added that there may be many more false I.D.s than area police have come in contact with.

"Sometimes it's hard to detect because of the quality of the I.D.," he said.

Some false I.D.s are immediately obvious, especially to those who can recognize them, because the change of a date is usually obvious, Woodyard said. The conditions in which the I.D. is presented and the likeness of the picture on the I.D. to its owner are other major tipoffs to a false I.D., Woodyard said.

"It used to be that you could buy I.D.s out of a magazine," he said. "No one should accept those (as legal identification). If they do, they take a chance (on allowing the use of fake identification)."

Private clubs, taverns, retail liquor stores and grocery stores all are equally responsible in assuring that everyone is of legal age when they buy any type of alcohol. Some of these establishments are extremely conscientious, while others are more passive when it comes to checking for false identification, Woodyard said.

An area of reasonableness is considered in deciding if the establishment took precautions to make sure the person who posseses the I.D. is its rightful owner.

"It's a bar's responsibility to ensure they sell to only people of legal age," he said.

How permissive the bar is in adhering to the legal-age requirement is a main consideration.

"If the bar has a history of trying to make sure everyone is of legal age, there could be leniency," Woodyard said.

He stressed that the reasons for use of a fake I.D. — whether it be for for entry into a bar, to obtain alcohol or in order to drive — are serious offenses.

Fruit, vegetable producers to hold three-day conference

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Fruit Growers and the Kansas Vegetable Growers are scheduled to converge in Manhattan Tuesday through Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome.

Production problems related to onions, sweet corn, zucchini, melons and sweet potatoes will be addressed Tuesday by vegetable growers and guest speakers.

A daylong joint session Wednesday will address marketing of fruits and vegetables and will feature Sam Brownback, state secretary of agriculture. Brownback is scheduled to discuss the scope and function of the agricultural board.

"This issue will concentrate on how Kansas markets can be expanded to accommodate fruits and vegetables," said Frank Morrison, professor of horticulture.

On Thursday, fruit growers will be addressing the issue of pest management for fruit crops.

"This involves the ways growers can efficiently control the pests on the fruit crop using the available resources," Morrison said.

During the three days of meetings, the fruit and vegetable producers will have a chance to obtain educational information about the industry.

Program speakers are the obvious source of information, Morrison said. A second source will be the growers relating their experiences during the topic discussions. Producers also will have a chance to visit commercial exhibitors displaying the newest equipment for chemical spraying and irrigation.

"The most important source of information for the producers is the individual, informal discussions they have in the hallways," Morrison said.

A total of 150 fruit and vegetable producers are expected for the three-day event, Morrison said.

"This is the only time these producers, as an organized group, get together," he said.

Each association is scheduled to hold annual meetings during the three days of programs.

Foreign students to take English test

By The Collegian Staff

International students wanting to be graduate teaching assistants must take a TSE (test of spoken English) before they can become a GTA.

"Complaints about foreign GTAs are the reason for the testing," said Enid Cocke, director of continuing education sponsored projects. "The complaints were taken to the Legislature, which in turn informed the Board of Regents to set up a uniform standard testing, which is what the TSE is."

The TSE, administered by the Educatonal Testing Service, is a test of speech consisting of grammar, pronunciation and the degree of fluency and is used to find the student's overall comprehensive ability. The lowest passing score is 220 out of 300. No longer is there any provisional status required as there was for the first year of testing, Cocke said.

"The Board of Regents have ruled that no foreign GTA can have any student contact without passing this test," she said.

So far, 13 students have signed up to take the test. The deadline for signing up is Wednesday.

The TSE will be given at 4:30 p.m. Friday and 10:30 a.m. Jan. 6, 1987. Both tests will be in Eisenhower 26. Students may take the examination on either test date but not both.

Prospective GTAs needing to take the test should register for one of the test times at the English Language Program office.

Using fake I.D. can lead to fine, jail sentence

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

The users of false identification and those who furnish it can face a tough penalty, regardless of their age or the situation in which they try to use fake identification cards.

Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department said to use or to knowingly permit the use of fake identification is a serious crime. The punishment for such crimes extends from a class B misdemeanor, which includes using or permitting the use of a false I.D., to a class E felony, for those who deal in false documents.

The class B misdemeanor carries a $1,000 fine and/or up to a six-month jail term. The class E felony has a $10,000 fine and/or a one- to five-year sentence.

A class A misdemeanor is imposed on any person who uses or knowingly permits the use of any identification to a person under 21 years of age in order for them to obtain alcohol. The same penalty is imposed on those who try to obtain cereal malt beverage and are under the legal age. The class A misdemeanor also applies to those using or lending a false I.D. in order to obtain a new or a duplicate identification card.

The class A misdemeanor carries up to a one-year jail sentence and/or $2,500 fine.

Woodyard said the problem of fake I.D.s "is not one of major magnitude" in Manhattan but added that there may be many more false I.D.s than area police have come in contact with.

"Sometimes it's hard to detect because of the quality of the I.D.," he said.

Some false I.D.s are immediately obvious, especially to those who can recognize them, because the change of a date is usually obvious, Woodyard said. The conditions in which the I.D. is presented and the likeness of the picture on the I.D. to its owner are other major tipoffs to a false I.D., Woodyard said.

"It used to be that you could buy I.D.s out of a magazine," he said. "No one should accept those (as legal identification). If they do, they take a chance (on allowing the use of fake identification)."

Private clubs, taverns, retail liquor stores and grocery stores all are equally responsible in assuring that everyone is of legal age when they buy any type of alcohol. Some of these establishments are extremely conscientious, while others are more passive when it comes to checking for false identification, Woodyard said.

An area of reasonableness is considered in deciding if the establishment took precautions to make sure the person who posseses the I.D. is its rightful owner.

"It's a bar's responsibility to ensure they sell to only people of legal age," he said.

How permissive the bar is in adhering to the legal-age requirement is a main consideration.

"If the bar has a history of trying to make sure everyone is of legal age, there could be leniency," Woodyard said.

He stressed that the reasons for use of a fake I.D. — whether it be for for entry into a bar, to obtain alcohol or in order to drive — are serious offenses.

Fruit, vegetable producers to hold three-day conference

The Kansas Fruit Growers and the Kansas Vegetable Growers are scheduled to converge in Manhattan Tuesday through Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome.

Production problems related to onions, sweet corn, zucchini, melons and sweet potatoes will be addressed Tuesday by vegetable growers and guest speakers.

A daylong joint session Wednesday will address marketing of fruits and vegetables and will feature Sam Brownback, state secretary of agriculture. Brownback is scheduled to discuss the scope and function of the agricultural board.

'Whirlwind' lacks force despite plot

By The Associated Press

WHIRLWIND. By James Clavell. Morrow. 1,147 Pages. $22.95.

"Whirlwind" is the new novel by James Clavell, author of such popular books as "King Rat," "Tai-pan," "Shogun" and "Noble House."

This latest story is set in revolutionary Iran between Feb. 9 and March 4, 1979. A multinational group of pilots must get themselves, their families and their helicopters safely out of a country that is undergoing great political and social change.

Given these ingredients — Clavell, revolution, Iran, and a time frame that spans days, not centuries — readers might expect a tight, action-packed drama with scarcely a moment to catch one's breath. Unfortunately, this is not the case.

The book sputters, like a fire that refuses to catch. Just as the reader gets involved with one character the action shifts to another. The story moves from one character and locale to the next, and then back again. With the novel's size — 1,147 pages, there is an overabundance of everything, including characters and subplots. It isn't until the final chapters — when Operation Whirlwind is finally in motion — that the fuse is lit, and the story moves with some of the style and pace readers have come to expect from Clavell.

All of this isn't to say that "Whirlwind" won't be a best seller. Yes, the story is tedious at times. Yes, some of the characters are stereotyped and some of the plot devices are thin and obvious. But for fans of Clavell — and he has many — the simple fact that "Whirlwind" is the fifth novel in his "Asian Saga" is reason enough to read the book.

After all, "Whirlwind" is an adventure story. And Clavell's cast of characters are all heroes — skilled, brave and daring. They are loyal to their employer; loved by their women; friends to the end. It's impossible not to cheer for these guys, even if the outcome is predictable.

Foreign students to take English test

By The Collegian Staff

International students wanting to be graduate teaching assistants must take a TSE (test of spoken English) before they can become a GTA.

"Complaints about foreign GTAs are the reason for the testing," said Enid Cocke, director of continuing education sponsored projects. "The complaints were taken to the Legislature, which in turn informed the Board of Regents to set up a uniform standard testing, which is what the TSE is."

The TSE, administered by the Educatonal Testing Service, is a test of speech consisting of grammar, pronunciation and the degree of fluency and is used to find the student's overall comprehensive ability. The lowest passing score is 220 out of 300. No longer is there any provisional status required as there was for the first year of testing, Cocke said.

"The Board of Regents have ruled that no foreign GTA can have any student contact without passing this test," she said.

So far, 13 students have signed up to take the test. The deadline for signing up is Wednesday.

The TSE will be given at 4:30 p.m. Friday and 10:30 a.m. Jan. 6, 1987. Both tests will be in Eisenhower 26. Students may take the examination on either test date but not both.

Prospective GTAs needing to take the test should register for one of the test times at the English Language Program office.

Using fake I.D. can lead to fine, jail sentence

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

The users of false identification and those who furnish it can face a tough penalty, regardless of their age or the situation in which they try to use fake identification cards.

Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department said to use or to knowingly permit the use of fake identification is a serious crime. The punishment for such crimes extends from a class B misdemeanor, which includes using or permitting the use of a false I.D., to a class E felony, for those who deal in false documents.

The class B misdemeanor carries a $1,000 fine and/or up to a six-month jail term. The class E felony has a $10,000 fine and/or a one- to five-year sentence.

A class A misdemeanor is imposed on any person who uses or knowingly permits the use of any identification to a person under 21 years of age in order for them to obtain alcohol. The same penalty is imposed on those who try to obtain cereal malt beverage and are under the legal age. The class A misdemeanor also applies to those using or lending a false I.D. in order to obtain a new or a duplicate identification card.

The class A misdemeanor carries up to a one-year jail sentence and/or $2,500 fine.

Woodyard said the problem of fake I.D.s "is not one of major magnitude" in Manhattan but added that there may be many more false I.D.s than area police have come in contact with.

"Sometimes it's hard to detect because of the quality of the I.D.," he said.

Some false I.D.s are immediately obvious, especially to those who can recognize them, because the change of a date is usually obvious, Woodyard said. The conditions in which the I.D. is presented and the likeness of the picture on the I.D. to its owner are other major tipoffs to a false I.D., Woodyard said.

"It used to be that you could buy I.D.s out of a magazine," he said. "No one should accept those (as legal identification). If they do, they take a chance (on allowing the use of fake identification)."

Private clubs, taverns, retail liquor stores and grocery stores all are equally responsible in assuring that everyone is of legal age when they buy any type of alcohol. Some of these establishments are extremely conscientious, while others are more passive when it comes to checking for false identification, Woodyard said.

An area of reasonableness is considered in deciding if the establishment took precautions to make sure the person who posseses the I.D. is its rightful owner.

"It's a bar's responsibility to ensure they sell to only people of legal age," he said.

How permissive the bar is in adhering to the legal-age requirement is a main consideration.

"If the bar has a history of trying to make sure everyone is of legal age, there could be leniency," Woodyard said.

He stressed that the reasons for use of a fake I.D. — whether it be for for entry into a bar, to obtain alcohol or in order to drive — are serious offenses.

Fruit, vegetable producers to hold three-day conference

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Fruit Growers and the Kansas Vegetable Growers are scheduled to converge in Manhattan Tuesday through Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome.

Production problems related to onions, sweet corn, zucchini, melons and sweet potatoes will be addressed Tuesday by vegetable growers and guest speakers.

A daylong joint session Wednesday will address marketing of fruits and vegetables and will feature Sam Brownback, state secretary of agriculture. Brownback is scheduled to discuss the scope and function of the agricultural board.

"This issue will concentrate on how Kansas markets can be expanded to accommodate fruits and vegetables," said Frank Morrison, professor of horticulture.

On Thursday, fruit growers will be addressing the issue of pest management for fruit crops.

"This involves the ways growers can efficiently control the pests on the fruit crop using the available resources," Morrison said.

During the three days of meetings, the fruit and vegetable producers will have a chance to obtain educational information about the industry.

Program speakers are the obvious source of information, Morrison said. A second source will be the growers relating their experiences during the topic discussions. Producers also will have a chance to visit commercial exhibitors displaying the newest equipment for chemical spraying and irrigation.

"The most important source of information for the producers is the individual, informal discussions they have in the hallways," Morrison said.

A total of 150 fruit and vegetable producers are expected for the three-day event, Morrison said.

"This is the only time these producers, as an organized group, get together," he said.

Each association is scheduled to hold annual meetings during the three days of programs.

Our musical ambassadors

The K-State Singers

Over the quiet chattering of the audience, the faint sound of tuning instruments filters through the room. A few familiar bars come from the strolling guitarist. The bass and piano seem to echo their reply.

The microphones are put into place just as the lights fade and the instruments fall silent. There is a hush of anticipation and a call for "Places! Lights! Curtain!"

"There's no curtain!" the Singers exclaim and launch enthusiastically into the opening number of their show.

Men in tuxedos and women in shimmery blue dresses captivate the audience with their smiles, even though it may be their third performance that day.

The K-State Singers will perform between 35 and 50 times this year for conventions, festivals and workshops. Many times they're not on a stage and without a curtain.

And what if there is a curtain?

"We'll sing the song anyway," said Lori Ingmire, junior in journalism and mass communications. "We always open with that number."

The group, which originated in 1954, has earned its image as K-State's "musical ambassadors" from its seven overseas tours — to the Orient, Europe and the Arctic — performing for the USO and Department of Defense.

Gerald Polich, associate professor of music, has directed the slick show of energy and class since 1966.

"Every year is different," Polich said. "There are new personalities and new challenges."

The Singers are all non-music majors, selected on the basis of poise, grades, energy and confidence.

"Most people can sing, but they need that confidence," said Jeff Wilson, junior in psychology.

From more than 100 applicants, finalists are chosen by Polich.

"I then have the finalists sing and dance for a panel of 30 to 40 alumni," Polich said. "I go with their decision."

The group consists of 12 vocalists, a percussionist, bass guitarist, rhythm

Those in at least their second year with the Singers are Ruth Flynn, junior in elementary education; JoAnn Boley, senior in marketing; Mike Neeland, senior in biology; Chuck Bowles, senior in journalism and mass communications; Kevin Mott, sophomore in journalism and mass communications; Scott Giersch, junior in animal sciences and industry; and George Martin, junior in electrical engineering.

"Singers has helped me open up a lot," Giersch said. "I'm having more fun this year because it's easier for me."

New to Singers this year are Jeff Wilson, junior in psychology; Dori Withers, junior in journalism and mass communications; Michele Schwarz, sophomore in preprofessional elementary education; Lori Ingmire, junior in journalism and mass communications; Sherri Simmons, junior in agricultural journalism; Les Lankhorst, sophomore in arts and sciences; Kenny Johnson, sophomore in animal sciences and industry; David Harris, junior in mechanical engineering; and Amy McAnarney, sophomore in preprofessional business administration.

Kevin Mott, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, and JoAnn Boley, senior in marketing, practice a dance step the Singers use during their concerts.

"The 'old' Singers are really good to us rookies," Wilson said. "They laugh with us, not at us."

Lots of time and dedication are required of the Singers. Before school began, the group practiced three or four times a day with the piano.

The instrumentalists start out by listening to the songs and experimenting with different styles and sounds.

"We can pretty much try what we want," said Martin, who plays rhythm guitar. "If Mr. Polich doesn't like it, he'll tell you and then you try something else."

The choreography for Singers is done by Sharron Washington, founder of the Washington School of Dance in Manhattan.

Rehearsal time seems to be pretty enjoyable for everyone.

"Mr. Polich never really gets upset," Wilson said. "We laugh all the time."

Giersch also said the Singers get along well with each other.

"There is a similarity there," he said. "It's almost a mold that Singers fit into."

After many hours of rehearsal, the Singers give their first "dry-run" show for a group of personal friends. Besides the "Friends" concert, they sang on Parents' Weekend and will do a benefit concert in the spring. The Singers will not, however, go on tour this year, Polich said.

"We needed to pay about $3,500 for new lights, and the sound system needed updating," Polich said.

The group is not funded through the University. Performance fees help pay for any travel, brochures, equipment, or telephone expenses of Singers, Polich said.

The Singers try to arrive for a performance about an hour beforehand. Everyone helps set the lights and sound equipment before changing clothes for the show.

"We do a sound check, but there's not much time for a warm-up," Simmons said. "Everyone warms up on their own."

Performances vary by nature of the audience and the time available. An average show may feature contemporary jazz, and songs from the '40s, and a ballad.

An audience favorite is a medley of Disney tunes like "Spoonful of Sugar," "Whistle While You Work," "It's a Small, Small World," and they finish the show with the Mickey Mouse Club song.

The group also has a comical collection of television commercial jingles, Polich said.

"I want people to come away from our shows saying they had a good time," Wilson said. "I hope it shows on stage how fun it really is for us."

The K-State Singers have remained popular through the years by adapting to the trends in music, Polich said.

"We will always do the best possible to excel in our performances," he said.

Cary Grant dies from stroke at 82

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Cary Grant, whose masculine elegance and darkly handsome features made him an unrivaled star of both sophisticated comedy and chilling intrigue for more than 30 years, has died of a massive stroke at the age of 82.

The debonair leading man with the dimpled chin and clipped accent died at 11:22 p.m. CST Saturday at St. Luke's Hospital in Davenport, Iowa, where he was to appear in a 90-minute program that included a talk and clips from his movies.

He had appeared well at rehearsals that afternoon, then seemed to weaken, said Lois Jecklin, director of Visiting Artists, which sponsored "A Conversation with Cary Grant." His condition deteriorated rapidly.

"There was nothing that could be done. There's no intervention when something like this happens," said James Gilson, the cardiologist who treated him.

His body reportedly was returned early Sunday to California. There was no immediate word on funeral plans.

Grant was one of the biggest names in movie history, starring in such classics as "The Philadelphia Story," "Bringing Up Baby" and "North by Northwest." But his only Oscar came after his retirement.

He seemed to have been born an aristocrat, but his father was a presser in a garment factory. He was the idol of millions of women around the world, but his private life often was troubled.

"I pretended to be somebody I wanted to be, and I finally became that person," Grant once said. "Or he became me. Or we met at some point. It's a relationship."

It was a singularly successful relationship, one that began in 1932 and filled the big screen with 72 movies until 1966, when his last film, "Walk, Don't Run," was released.

Grant, wrote film critic Pauline Kael, "had the longest romantic reign in the short history of movies." He was paired with Katharine Hepburn, Myrna Loy, Audrey Hepburn and Grace Kelley. To him Mae West tendered the most famous, and frequently misquoted, proposition in movie history: "Why don't you come up sometime and see me?"

He was born Archibald Leach on Jan. 18, 1904, in Bristol, England, the only child of an unhappy marriage. His father often was withdrawn and his mother filled him with dreams of wealth and taught him to sing and dance.

When he was 9, his mother was placed in a mental institution, and the boy would not see her for 20 years. When he was 13, Archie ran away from home to join a boys' troupe, but his father retrieved him.

He later rejoined the group, but left it in 1922 in New York, taking on a variety of jobs, including stilt-walker at Coney Island, a slapstick mime on the vaudeville circuit and a straight man for comedy acts. He began dressing with conservative elegance and was a hit with New York hostesses.

By 1931 he had a movie contract with Paramount and a new name: Cary, for a part he'd had in a play, and Grant, chosen from a list prepared by the studio.

He made seven films in his first year, including "Blonde Venus" with Marlene Dietrich. Then he caught the eye of Mae West, who cast him opposite her in "She Done Him Wrong" and "I'm No Angel." Both were box office smashes.

In 1937 he left Paramount, and the most memorable roles of his career followed. The danger that seemed to lurk beneath the charm made him the perfect lead for such Hitchcock thrillers as "Suspicion" and "To Catch a Thief."

His accent made him a favorite with impressionists, but he never said, "Judy, Judy, Judy."

He was nominated for Academy Awards for "Penny Serenade" and "None but the Lonely Heart," and in 1970 he received an honorary Oscar for "his unique mastery of the art of screen acting."

Grant, who became a U.S. citizen in 1942, amassed a fortune estimated as high as $40 million.

In 1981, Grant married Barbara Harris, a public relations director for a London hotel and 47 years his junior. The fifth Mrs. Grant later said the age difference was an advantage.

"We don't argue over ridiculous things," she said. "We appreciate each other more than a younger couple because time is so precious."

Foreign students to take English test

By The Collegian Staff

International students wanting to be graduate teaching assistants must take a TSE (test of spoken English) before they can become a GTA.

"Complaints about foreign GTAs are the reason for the testing," said Enid Cocke, director of continuing education sponsored projects. "The complaints were taken to the Legislature, which in turn informed the Board of Regents to set up a uniform standard testing, which is what the TSE is."

The TSE, administered by the Educatonal Testing Service, is a test of speech consisting of grammar, pronunciation and the degree of fluency and is used to find the student's overall comprehensive ability. The lowest passing score is 220 out of 300. No longer is there any provisional status required as there was for the first year of testing, Cocke said.

"The Board of Regents have ruled that no foreign GTA can have any student contact without passing this test," she said.

So far, 13 students have signed up to take the test. The deadline for signing up is Wednesday.

The TSE will be given at 4:30 p.m. Friday and 10:30 a.m. Jan. 6, 1987. Both tests will be in Eisenhower 26. Students may take the examination on either test date but not both.

Prospective GTAs needing to take the test should register for one of the test times at the English Language Program office.

Using fake I.D. can lead to fine, jail sentence

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

The users of false identification and those who furnish it can face a tough penalty, regardless of their age or the situation in which they try to use fake identification cards.

Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department said to use or to knowingly permit the use of fake identification is a serious crime. The punishment for such crimes extends from a class B misdemeanor, which includes using or permitting the use of a false I.D., to a class E felony, for those who deal in false documents.

The class B misdemeanor carries a $1,000 fine and/or up to a six-month jail term. The class E felony has a $10,000 fine and/or a one- to five-year sentence.

A class A misdemeanor is imposed on any person who uses or knowingly permits the use of any identification to a person under 21 years of age in order for them to obtain alcohol. The same penalty is imposed on those who try to obtain cereal malt beverage and are under the legal age. The class A misdemeanor also applies to those using or lending a false I.D. in order to obtain a new or a duplicate identification card.

The class A misdemeanor carries up to a one-year jail sentence and/or $2,500 fine.

Woodyard said the problem of fake I.D.s "is not one of major magnitude" in Manhattan but added that there may be many more false I.D.s than area police have come in contact with.

"Sometimes it's hard to detect because of the quality of the I.D.," he said.

Some false I.D.s are immediately obvious, especially to those who can recognize them, because the change of a date is usually obvious, Woodyard said. The conditions in which the I.D. is presented and the likeness of the picture on the I.D. to its owner are other major tipoffs to a false I.D., Woodyard said.

"It used to be that you could buy I.D.s out of a magazine," he said. "No one should accept those (as legal identification). If they do, they take a chance (on allowing the use of fake identification)."

Private clubs, taverns, retail liquor stores and grocery stores all are equally responsible in assuring that everyone is of legal age when they buy any type of alcohol. Some of these establishments are extremely conscientious, while others are more passive when it comes to checking for false identification, Woodyard said.

An area of reasonableness is considered in deciding if the establishment took precautions to make sure the person who posseses the I.D. is its rightful owner.

"It's a bar's responsibility to ensure they sell to only people of legal age," he said.

How permissive the bar is in adhering to the legal-age requirement is a main consideration.

"If the bar has a history of trying to make sure everyone is of legal age, there could be leniency," Woodyard said.

He stressed that the reasons for use of a fake I.D. — whether it be for for entry into a bar, to obtain alcohol or in order to drive — are serious offenses.

Fruit, vegetable producers to hold three-day conference

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Fruit Growers and the Kansas Vegetable Growers are scheduled to converge in Manhattan Tuesday through Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome.

Production problems related to onions, sweet corn, zucchini, melons and sweet potatoes will be addressed Tuesday by vegetable growers and guest speakers.

A daylong joint session Wednesday will address marketing of fruits and vegetables and will feature Sam Brownback, state secretary of agriculture. Brownback is scheduled to discuss the scope and function of the agricultural board.

"This issue will concentrate on how Kansas markets can be expanded to accommodate fruits and vegetables," said Frank Morrison, professor of horticulture.

On Thursday, fruit growers will be addressing the issue of pest management for fruit crops.

"This involves the ways growers can efficiently control the pests on the fruit crop using the available resources," Morrison said.

During the three days of meetings, the fruit and vegetable producers will have a chance to obtain educational information about the industry.

Program speakers are the obvious source of information, Morrison said. A second source will be the growers relating their experiences during the topic discussions. Producers also will have a chance to visit commercial exhibitors displaying the newest equipment for chemical spraying and irrigation.

"The most important source of information for the producers is the individual, informal discussions they have in the hallways," Morrison said.

A total of 150 fruit and vegetable producers are expected for the three-day event, Morrison said.

"This is the only time these producers, as an organized group, get together," he said.

Each association is scheduled to hold annual meetings during the three days of programs.

Gifts to delight the most discriminating buyer

By The Associated Press

It's the holiday season and the top-of-the-line catalogs are out in force for the financially fortunate.

The guide to seasonal shopping chic in Texas, the Neiman-Marcus Christmas catalog, is offering His-Her gifts this year of specially bred spotted kittens — at $1,400 each.

Another listing suggests that the hard-to-please friend who keeps a pet cat might be pleased to get a $1.1 million home for the kitty shaped like an Egyptian temple and made of lapis, quartz and turquoise.

The semi-precious stone house also makes a nice conversation piece and comes complete with deed, architectural plan and owner's manual, according to the annual Robb Report on extravagant Christmas stocking stuffers, released in Boston. The publication calls itself the "magazine for people with million-dollar taste."

One catalog retailer commissioned original artwork, by Thomas McKnight, for the two covers of its Christmas catalog. The two paintings, selling at $25,000 each, are the most expensive items in the Spiegel catalog.

Spiegel said it mailed 4 million 1986 Christmas catalogs to customers in the United States.

Baccarat Crystal, in its color Museum Reproduction Collection catalog in French and English, offers crystal pieces designed between 1830 and 1930 — with prices ranging from $1,000 to $5,300.

The Neiman-Marcus catalog, famous for lavish gifts sprinkled among more conventional Christmas gift items, also offers a portrait session with pop artist Andy Warhol's studio for the rich who want to be famous.

that floats on aluminum pontoons and is studded with flashing lights.

For those who feel the million-dollar-plus cozy for the cat isn't spending enough for the holidays, the Robb Report suggests a $5 million miniseries on the life of your spouse.

The four-hour film will be shot by a professional crew which will recruit makeup artists and actors, and provide period

Taken by Palm Beach itself? Why not reward your spouse with a $25 million mansion with retracting 18-foot windows, chandeliers which automatically raise and lower for easy cleaning, heated salt water pool and cabana with heated marble floors? The Regency-style Florida manse was built for the late "hostess extraordinaire" Anita O'Keeffe Young, the Robb Report said.

For people who prefer events over real estate, the magazine suggests a $1 million party.

The blowout at the site of your choice — Liberty Island, Grand Central Station or the Grand Canyon — includes pianist Peter Duchin playing for guests who will be served bubbly, caviar and a 10-foot cake of Disney characters.

The event climaxes with a helicopter "covered in diamond dust" towing a rhinestone banner with your specified message.

For $35,000, the recipient will be flown to New York to be painted in Warhol's studio. But there's a limit: only three people can buy that gift.

"A wonderful part is that later you receive 900 reproductions for Christmas cards for 1987," said Pat Morgan, Neiman's vice president of mail order merchandising.

Other choices include an $80,000 Bubble Boat. The 12-foot diameter boat, styled like a spacecraft, has a galvanized steel dome costumes and automobiles or even Arabian horses.

Then there are the 22-carat gold epaulettes with seed pearl braids, not for generals, but for fashion-conscious women. Since only seven pairs are being made for a New York firm, their exclusivity might help justify the $15,000 price tag.

For the pedigreed hound in your life, there are Molly's Palm Beach Dog Biscuits, six for $3.50, and shaped like 1954 Bentleys, of course.

"This involves the ways growers can efficiently control the pests on the fruit crop using the available resources," Morrison said.

During the three days of meetings, the fruit and vegetable producers will have a chance to obtain educational information about the industry.

Program speakers are the obvious source of information, Morrison said. A second source will be the growers relating their experiences during the topic discussions. Producers also will have a chance to visit commercial exhibitors displaying the newest equipment for chemical spraying and irrigation.

"The most important source of information for the producers is the individual, informal discussions they have in the hallways," Morrison said.

A total of 150 fruit and vegetable producers are expected for the three-day event, Morrison said.

"This is the only time these producers, as an organized group, get together," he said.

Each association is scheduled to hold annual meetings during the three days of programs.

S. African government denies wall will enclose fourth black township

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A concrete wall is being built around parts of Soweto. The government said Sunday the barrier would not enclose the entire black township, but workers building the wall contradicted this.

Construction began last week, but there was no official announcement.

Andriana Andersen, a spokeswoman for the government Bureau for Information, said the wall was designed to block children and animals from running onto a major highway which curves around an area of Soweto called Diepkloof.

She said the wall would not enclose the entire township, which covers 38 square miles near Johannesburg and is home to about 1.7 million blacks. She said the wall so far extends several hundred yards and is about 7 feet high.

The Sunday Star, an independent English-language, quoted workmen at the site as saying they were told the wall was meant to enclose the entire township.

Three black townships around the Indian Ocean city of Port Elizabeth have been fenced off by barbed wire for months, with access to the townships possible only through checkpoints manned by the security forces.

Student earns awards on rodeo circuit

Cowboy maintains family tradition

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

Although it can be a dangerous business, sometimes it pays to be a cowboy.

For Jeff Brecheisen, junior in speech, it really pays. Brecheisen is a "professional cowboy" and competes in rodeos to make money.

"I started rodeoing (professionally) about four years ago," he said. "But I always liked going to rodeos with my dad."

Brecheisen, 23, competed in his first rodeo at the age of 5. He was 6 when he won his first belt buckle, a standard prize for placing in a rodeo.

"I wore that thing out," he said.

What he does best is roping calves and bulldogging steers, which is throwing steers by seizing their horns and twisting their heads around.

Brecheisen said that although most "ropers" and "bulldoggers" are fairly big men, it doesn't matter that he's not.

"I don't have a lot of brute strength," he said, "just technique."

For Brecheisen and his brother, Dale Lynn Brecheisen, the rodeo is almost a way of life.

While at home near Wellsville, the two were able to practice in an arena on their farm.

"We had this 'bucking barrel,' too. My brother and I played on it all the time," Brecheisen said. "My brother still practices with me some. He's real good, too."

Brecheisen's father, Dale Brecheisen, also has been a "great rodeoer," he said.

Having a dad who plays the same game his kids do can be a great advantage.

"My dad watched world champions on TV. Then I started watching," Brecheisen said. "I've just kept learning from what my dad said and what I've seen the world champions do.

"My dad always kept us supplied in calves and things. All we ever had to do was rope. He knows what fast horses are, too. He supplies us with 'rockets.'"

While he was in high school, Brecheisen twice was named the state high-school calf-roping champion. He also was a team roping champion and an all-around champion.

Since then, he has been named the United Rodeo Steer-Wrestling Champion and was selected as one of the three top rodeo participants in the state by the North American Rodeo Commission.

"I'm mounted on fast horses," he said. "That makes a big difference."

Brecheisen explained that a 7.6-second run — the time it takes a calf roper to ride down the arena, rope the calf, run down the rope, flank the calf and tie the calf's three legs with the rope — is "real good."

"My best time is eight (seconds) flat," he said.

Brecheisen does most of his competing when he is not in school. He said he usually competes in three or four rodeos a week in the summer.

Although he competes professionally in the summer, Brecheisen also is a member of the K-State Rodeo Club. He competes about once a week with the club while in school.

"College rodeos pay real good," he said. "But in the summer, you know that if you have a bad night, there's another chance the next day or so."

Brecheisen's ability enables him to earn several thousand dollars in summer competition alone, he said. But despite good technique, accidents occasionally happen.

"I took a lot of wrecks. It was something I grew up with. I'll have more, too," he said.

Brecheisen lives on a farm near Zeandale, where he has a place to practice and room to keep a horse, named "Tom," and a few cows.

In his living room rests a saddle he won in a rodeo. Brecheisen said he has won other saddles, too, but has sold some of them.

Some mementos he will never sell are photographs of him while competing. And, of course, he'll always have his memories.

Staff/Robert Squires

Jeff Brecheisen, junior in speech, is following in the footsteps of his older brother and father as a professional rodeo cowboy. Brecheisen, who rode in his first rodeo at the age of 5, has competed professionally for five years.

Explosion injures doctor during booby trap mishap

By The Associated Press

ANDALUSIA, Ala. — A doctor who set booby traps after several burglaries at his home was shot in the chest by one of the devices, and Army explosives experts disarmed 15 booby traps at the home, police said Sunday.

Dr. Joseph H. Sox was in critical but stable condition at a Pensacola, Fla., hospital on Sunday, one day after being accidentally shot by a "pipe gun" device in his garage, said Covington County Sheriff Don Harrell.

The device was made from a piece of pipe with a load of buckshot in back, said Harrell.

Seven booby traps were disarmed inside the house and eight were found outside, one of them aimed at the front driveway, said Harrell.

The traps were rigged to be triggered by large rat traps strung by fish line to pieces of pipe loaded with buckshot and black powder, said Harrell.

No charges had been filed, but the investigation would continue, he said.

'Cats trounce South Dakota, 95-45

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Lon Kruger made a triumphant return to the floor of Ahearn Field House as the Wildcats trounced an overmatched South Dakota squad 95-45 Saturday in Kruger's debut as the Wildcats' head coach.

"It's a special moment. It means a great deal having played here," said Kruger, who starred as a player for the Wildcats from 1971-74.

The Wildcats appeared a bit nervous in the opening minutes as they allowed the Coyotes to take an early 8-7 lead before running off the next 10 points to take control of the contest.

"We were a little bit sloppy in the early going," Kruger said, "but I think (the players') enthusiasm, their effort and commitment were all there. They were just a little bit too pumped up, maybe."

The Wildcats closed the opening half with a 21-3 run that sent them into the locker room with a 53-22 halftime advantage and leaving little doubt as to the game's outcome.

K-State applied an aggressive full-court defense, which forced an incredible 23 turnovers by South Dakota in the opening half. Senior guard Lynn Smith, who had eight steals for the night, spearheaded the defensive attack.

"We have a lot of good defensive players," Smith said, "but because I'm at the point, I have to start the defensive pressure.

"We forced the tempo and overplayed a lot. We played pretty good, solid defense."

The Wildcats came out in the second half and gradually extended their lead to the final 50-point margin.

Though Kruger found little satisfaction in beating a team that badly, he did say the victory was a good one for the team.

"I was pleased for the kids to have success because they've been working awfully hard," Kruger said. "All of them got some time, and that's always good."

Sophomores Lance Simmons and Mark Dobbins each poured in 15 points to lead a balanced attack that saw five Wildcats in double figures. William Scott added 13, while Moberly (Mo.) Junior College transfers Mitch Richmond and Charles Bledsoe each chipped in 11.

It was the inside play of Simmons, who scored the 'Cats' first five points, which kept the Wildcats close early before they were able to break the game open.

"I think our inside game overpowered them," Simmons said.

South Dakota head coach Doug Martin was impressed with the aggressiveness of K-State.

"It was a great learning experience," he said. "They just out-quicked, out-hustled and out-shot us. They played good basketball. Every loose ball went to them, and again, they just out-hustled us."

After the game, Wildcat players expressed relief that actual competition had finally begun.

"We were ready to play, that's for sure," said freshman guard Steve Henson. "We'd been practicing and playing against each other for a long time, and we were ready to get a real game under our belt.

"It's pretty satisfying. Everybody got to play a little bit, and we played pretty well."

With the loss, the Coyotes dropped to 1-2 for the year.

K-State will see its next action tonight at Ahearn with a 7:35 tipoff against Grand Canyon, a National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics team coached by former NBA star Paul Westphal. The Antelopes will carry a 2-4 mark into the contest and are coming off a 90-67 loss to Fort Hays State Saturday.

K-State center Ron Meyer (45) and forward Mitch Richmond (23) defend University of South Dakota guard Kyle Collins during the Wildcats' season-opening 95-45 win Saturday in Ahearn Field House. Meyer scored five points and Richmond had 11 in his K-State debut.

Seniors lead K-State to Classic title

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Entering the McCall Pattern Classic, K-State Lady Cat basketball coach Matilda Mossman had a number of questions concerning her team's preparations for the season.

Well, Mossman's fears were relieved over the weekend when the Lady Cats blasted their opponents and placed four team members on the all-tournament team en route to capturing the tourney title.

On Friday, K-State totally dominated the Westerwinds from Western Illinois and walked away with an easy 84-46 victory. Not only did the win place K-State in the finals against Loyola Marymount, which nudged Texas-Arlington 55-53, but it was also Mossman's 100th victory as a head coach.

In the championship game on Saturday, K-State again found itself in a position of domination, waltzing to an easy 73-49 win over Loyola Marymount.

The victory ensured positions on the all-tournament team for K-State's Sue Leiding, Susan Green, Theza Fitzpatrick and Carlisa Thomas, who was named the tourney's Most Valuable Player.

Thomas won the honor despite scoring just seven points in the title contest, but she did grab 10 rebounds. Thomas' cold shooting hand frustrated her throughout the course of the game.

"I don't think I did as well as I could have tonight. I was impressed because I got the MVP, but I don't think I did as well as I could," Thomas said.

Mossman not only praised the play of Thomas, but also gave high accolades to freshman Carol Smith. After a sluggish start, Mossman attributed the Lady Cats' pulling away from the Lions to the play of the guard from Detroit.

"Probably the biggest turnaround was Carol Smith providing the spark," Mossman said. "And of course, Carlisa Thomas was her usual amazing self. Nothing she does ceases to surprise me."

For Mossman, the Lady Cats' fast start through two games is a relief. Her roster is filled by six freshmen who were accompanied by many questions concerning their ability to step in and have an immediate impact.

"Obviously, we're real proud of how we competed, not only by their winning, but by the margin," Mossman said. "This team has a great shot at going far. We're young, but the four seniors really help.

"I think the main thing is we're much more consistent. Everyone comes to practice ready to play hard and that means a lot," Mossman said.

Defending national champs plummet to 0-3 at Shootout

By The Associated Press

Louisville Coach Denny Crum, a firm believer that a rugged early schedule gets his team ready for the NCAA basketball tournament, has found it tough sledding in the Great Alaska Shootout.

The defending national champions dropped to 0-3 after losing to Texas 74-70 Sunday in the seventh-place game at Anchorage. Texas had lost 80-68 to Alaska-Anchorage Saturday.

No. 10 Iowa faced Northeastern for the Shootout title Sunday night, while No. 17 North Carolina State met Utah State for third place.

Ranked No. 2 in the preseason poll, Louisville lost to Washington 69-54 Saturday in the consolation round after being beaten by Northeastern 88-84 in overtime Friday night.

"If I was really concerned about winning, we'd be playing at home," Crum said after the Washington setback. "But I want the kids to learn and that's why you come to a tournament like this."

In the Shootout semifinals Saturday, Iowa beat N.C. State 90-89 in overtime and Northeastern topped Utah State 96-91.

Coleman accepts NCAA's ruling, will sit out first 12 games

K-State basketball player Norris Coleman is a very low-keyed individual.

Maybe it was that trait in his character that helped him withstand the controversy surrounding a National Collegiate Athletic Association investigation and the following rulings concerning his high-school grades.

In the end, the 25-year-old Coleman did not get what he had hoped for — an opportunity to play with his teammates when they opened their season Saturday night with a 95-45 drubbing of South Dakota.

No, the NCAA has ruled Coleman must sit out until the 13th game of the season when K-State opens its Big Eight schedule against Nebraska. Despite Coleman's displeasure with the NCAA's final decision, he finds it comforting to be done with the situation.

"It's over with and I don't think of it anymore," said Coleman, a veteran of almost six years of military service. "I'm looking forward to playing on Jan. 10. I feel as though I've got peace of mind now, because I know I'm definitely going to play."

Following K-State's game with Grand Canyon tonight in Ahearn Field House, Coleman's waiting period will be down to 10 games. NCAA rules bar him from traveling with the team, so when the Wildcats take off over the Christmas break for a six-game road trip, Coleman will not be with them. Coleman plans to either visit his mother in Jacksonville, Fla., or his 18-month-old daughter, N'Keshia Janai', in Campbellsville, Ky., where he was stationed prior to coming to K-State.

Meanwhile, K-State must survive its remaining 11 games without the services of the 6-foot-8 forward, who led the nation's freshman class in scoring last season with a 21.8-point average.

To first-year K-State coach Lon Kruger, this might just be a blessing in disguise as his Wildcats face their less-than-rugged non-conference schedule without the man who last season was the team's inspiration.

"There are naturally some minutes there which some other kids are going to pick up," said Kruger, who played for and was an assistant coach at K-State. "It's an opportunity for someone to step up and establish himself, when otherwise, they may not have had that chance."

Coleman said he likes this year's Wildcat team, despite the fact the added scoring punch of three junior-college transfers might cut into his statistics.

"We've got a scrappy bunch. Last year, I just had to score. With Coach Kruger's offense, anybody is capable of scoring 20 points on a given night," Coleman said.

When the NCAA made the original ruling, it invited Coleman to transfer to another member institution (other than a Big Eight school) without losing a year of eligibility. But, when it came time for Coleman to make his decision, his low-keyed stature prevailed.

"These are caring people in Manhattan and I guess that's why I stayed here," he said. "I've been in the fast life before and I don't like it as much. I feel warm here knowing that these people care about me and I care about them."

The final NCAA ruling not only orders Coleman to repay K-State for the financial aid he received while ineligible, it also takes a year of eligibility, making him a junior when he steps on the court against Nebraska.

The lost year of eligibility appears to mean little to the patient Coleman, who is not even making plans for what he will be doing when K-State takes the floor next season.

"It's like college basketball was — it's always in the back of my mind. I'm not saying I will or won't be back next year. A lot of it depends on whether or not we go to the NCAA tourney and what type of season I have," Coleman said. "I know I'm going to play some type (of) professional basketball. I'd like to play in the NBA, but if I can't, my life doesn't stop there. I'll just have to move on."

'Cats' cross country squads place ninth, 21st at Tuscon

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

K-State's women's cross country team captured ninth and the Wildcat men placed 21st at the National Collegiate Athletic Association championships Nov. 24 in Tucson, Ariz.

Chris Vanatta captured sixth-place honors to lead the women to their top-10 finish at the LaCanada Golf Course. Vanatta, who won the District Five meet two weeks ago, posted a 5,000-meter time of 17 minutes, 18.27 seconds to receive All-American honors.

Gaining the top spot for the K-State men was senior Ron Stahl, who garnered a 44th-place finish on the 10,000-meter course.

"I'm happy with the women's and men's efforts, but we could have finished higher in the women's standings," K-State head coach John Capriotti said.

Betsy Silzer was the next Wildcat finisher with a mark of 17:58.49 to take 41st, while Jacque Struckhoff finished 77th in a time of 18:27.43. Anneli Edling and Nancy Hoffman placed 82nd and 95th, respectively, while Alysun Deckert ended up 118th.

Texas won the women's title with 62 points, edging out Wisconsin's 64. The rest of the top 10 was Kentucky (159), Oregon (167), Clemson (171), Colorado (186), Yale (201), Brigham Young (203), K-State (205) and Arkansas (214).

In the men's race, Arkansas took the men's title with 69 points.

"Our finish is not as good as we would have liked, but our goal was to beat somebody and we did," Capriotti said. "I thought our lack of experience hurt us, but I thought our seniors — Stahl and Jim Knudsen — handled it well."

Stahl finished in a time of 31:54.0, missing All-American honors by just seven seconds. Knudsen took 89th place in a time of 32:41.0, while Jan Jonsson and Pat Hessini ended up 133rd and 159th, respectively.

Buffalo shatters road losing streak, KC's playoff hopes with 17-14 win

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Buffalo Coach Marv Levy tried but couldn't hide the pleasure he felt after beating the team that fired him in 1982.

Jim Kelly threw two touchdown passes to Andre Reed to give Levy and the Bills a 17-14 victory over the Kansas City Chiefs Sunday.

"Certainly, to come back in where you had coached before and win, certainly it's gratifying," said Levy after the victory was preserved when Chiefs kicker Nick Lowery missed a 44-yard field goal with 19 seconds left.

"I don't feel any different than I do after any other win," said Levy, who was fired by the Chiefs after a 3-6 record in the strike-shortened 1982 season. "It's good to win and maybe this one had a little extra meaning to it."

Buffalo, 4-9 and 2-2 since Levy replaced Hank Bullough, had lost 22 straight games on the road, one short of the record 23 lost by Houston from 1981-84. The Bills last road victory was in Kansas City on Dec. 4, 1983.

Kansas City quarterback Bill Kenney was disheartened by a third straight loss that probably ended the Chiefs playoff hopes in the AFC West. Kansas City is 7-6.

"We prepared very hard," Kenney said. "It seemed that in the first half, we hardly had the ball at all. We put ourself in long yardage situations and didn't pick up the blitz very well."

Kansas City had drawn within 17-14 with 4:34 to go, and then got the ball back seconds later when Kevin Ross recovered a fumble by Pete Metzelaars. Kenney was intercepted on the next play for the third time in the game as Charles Romes outwrestled Stephone Paige for the ball in the end zone.

Kelly ended an 11-play drive in the third quarter with a 10-yard scoring pass to Reed with 8:48 left in the period.

Kelly had passed nine yards to Reed to give Buffalo a 10-7 lead at halftime.

The Chiefs scored on their first possession of the game on a 12-yard pass from Kenney to Paige.

Scott Norwood kicked a 47-yard field goal at the start of the second quarter for Buffalo.

The Bills got a second chance on the drive leading to the kick with a first down after Bill Maas was penalized for roughing punter John Kidd on the Buffalo 26.

view of U.S. military advisers, could have been funded from Iranian arm sales without Reagan and other top officials knowing.

U.S. government officials, familiar with the North operation but insisting on anonymity, said that although the Iranian-Contra link was a closely held secret inside the White House, North's management of the air operation was known to officials in the State Department, Pentagon, CIA and the NSC.

"Everyone knew something was going on down there and that Ollie (North) was doing it," one official said.

The air operation came to light Oct. 5 when an American-manned C-123K cargo plane was shot down over southern Nicaragua while flying guns to the Contras. Two Americans were killed and one crewman, Eugene Hasenfus, is now a prisoner of the leftist Nicaraguan government.

Documents recovered from the plane and interviews with principals show that the Ilopango operation was a major resupply effort, involving more than 100 flights dating back to early 1986. Reagan secretly authorized U.S. arms sales to Iran in January.

Over several months early this year, the air wing obtained two C-123K cargo planes, two DHC-4 "Caribou" supply planes and one light Maule plane, particularly effective on short runways, according to Hasenfus and documents on the planes.

Other documents, obtained by The Associated Press, show Southern Air Transport of Miami, a onetime CIA-owned company, paying for repairs and installation of electronic gear aboard the planes. Knowledgeable sources also said Southern Air helped recruit the team of about two dozen Americans who flew and maintained the planes in El Salvador.

Southern Air spokesman William Kress said the company was reimbursed for costs related to the program, but he would not say who ultimately paid the bills. "We just don't divulge those practices," Kress said.

Southern Air, which was sold by the CIA in 1973, also appears to have been involved in the transfer of weapons to Iran, flying four missions in the first half of 1986 from Kelly Air Force Base in Texas, where some of the Iranian weapons originated, to Tel Aviv, U.S. Transportation Department records show. Meese said Israeli intermediaries transferred the arms to the Iranians.

Another key figure in both the Iranian arms sales and the Contra resupply operation was retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard V. Secord, a former top Pentagon official on the Middle East.

One administration official said Secord served as North's "right-hand man" in handling the Contra and Iranian operations.

Salvadoran telephone records from the safe houses used by the air resupply operation show repeated phone calls in September to Stanford Technology Trading Corp., a Vienna, Va., firm run by Secord, and to North's private lines at the White House.

Secord has denied involvement with the air resupply network.

Dole

atmosphere," and instead urged Reagan to appoint an independent counsel.

One senior Justice Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Sunday he believes "the weight of the arguments now favor moving to an independent counsel." But he did not believe that a decision had been made to take the probe out of the hands of Attorney General Edwin Meese III and other Justice officials.

Byrd and Dole said they had discussed the proposal to name a special panel, which the Democratic leader said must be done by the full Congress "so that the committee would have all the powers of subpoena...which the two leaders themselves cannot give it."

Dole, interviewed on ABC's "This Week with David Brinkley," said Congress "ought to be called back to town next week," rather than waiting until it reconvenes with new members in January.

White House spokesman Dan Howard called Dole's proposal "a novel idea," but declined direct comment on it.

"We simply haven't had time to consider it," he said. "No one is more interested in getting to the bottom of this than the president, and he wants to do so quickly."

Reagan, on his way to Washington from a Thanksgiving holiday at his California ranch, told reporters, "We're doing everything necessary to get at the truth and we will make the truth known." The president did not answer any further questions.

Although Republicans will retain control of the Senate until the 100th Congress meets in January, Dole said a Democrat would probably be appointed to head any select committee.

"We'd probably have to pattern it after the so-called Watergate commission," Dole said, referring to the congressional panel whose televised hearings played a critical role in forcing the resignation of President Richard Nixon in 1974.

No president has summoned a special session of Congress since Harry Truman called lawmakers back to Washington in 1948 to deal with labor disputes, said Dole.

Byrd said a special counsel should be appointed to investigate disclosures that a White House aide, Lt. Col. Oliver North, arranged for up to $30 million in proceeds from the secret sale of arms to Iran to be channeled to help Contra rebels fighting Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government.

The revelations announced by Meese last week forced the removal of North and resignation of national security adviser Vice Adm. John Poindexter.

Administration officials have said the Justice Department will handle the investigation for the executive branch.

Both the Senate and House intelligence committees have already started their own investigations of the Iran and Nicaraguan transactions, and lawmakers are calling for judiciary, armed services and foreign affairs committees to follow suit.

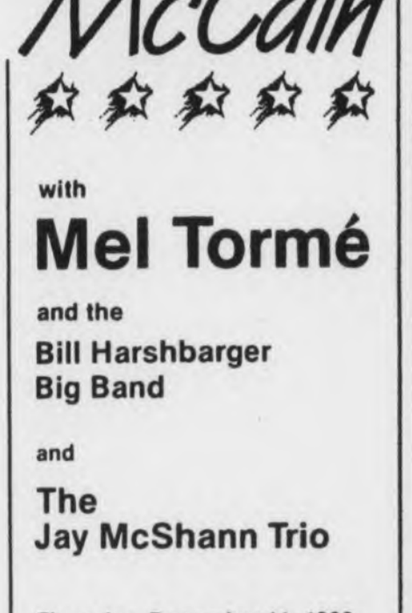
position (of Senate)."

Johnson said he will propose a bill to create a task force to better explore the different combinations of Senate representation.

"I think we need to call for a group of all the people that are affected and really sit down and determine what mix would be right, and then say, 'this is the best proposal that we can offer you,'" Johnson said.

He said members of the group should include a few co-sponsors of the bill, individuals from residence halls, greek students and off-campus students.

Johnson was not alone in making his decision to veto the bill. Johnson said he and four of his cabinet members discussed the matter extensively before deciding on the veto.



"The one unified thought through it all was that we realized we had to go somewhere to answer the questions," said cabinet member Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics and Johnson's special project director.

Johnson said the reason his cabinet favors a task force is because the bill was delayed two weeks in Senate for further idea input, but input never occurred. He said that after the delay, discussion was centered on whether the referendum should take place and not on any new ideas for restructuring the proposed representation enhancement.

"The task force then would provide that alternative for having this discussion," Johnson said.

Africa

television station in Washington. NEH does not approve of the film because it is biased against the West and asked the NEH logo and name be removed from the credits of the film, Cheney said.

WETA President Ward B. Chamberlin Jr. was quoted by the New York Times as saying, "In the proposal, balance was never called for. It (the series) is an African's view of Africa."

"This reaction is a dramatic example of why, for all our greatness and goodness, we Americans have so much trouble getting along in the world," McCormally said. "We want so much for the world to be what we say it is, rather than accepting it and dealing with it as it truly is.

"The point, though, is that in the African scale of values, political tranquility and sense of community are far more important than mere economic success. Not in America, perhaps, but in Africa."

Ali Mazrui, who commentates the series, is a political science professor at the University of Michigan and the University of Jos in Nigeria. Mazrui was born in Kenya, raised a Moslem and educated in England.

Ottenheimer said Mazrui is presenting the view of many Africans, but some Africans say Mazrui is too conservative.

David Hirschmann, a professor of political science who previously taught at K-State and is teaching at American University in Washington, recently returned from doing research in South Africa. Ottenheimer had a chance to talk with him at the annual meeting of the African Studies Association earlier this month.

Ottenheimer said Hirschmann found in his research that Africans consider President Ronald Reagan the "Ayatollah of Capitalism."

"It is worthwhile to know," McCormally said, "that for most Africans, Gadhafi is a hero for standing up to Reagan. Not pleasant to know, perhaps, but worthwhile."

Mazrui also was at the annual meeting. Ottenheimer asked him what he thought of the criticism. Mazrui said the purpose of the series was to present the African view of the West's influence, and those who have been criticizing the series have taken small parts of the program and blown them out of proportion.

"He's (Mazrui) done a fairly good job in presenting a view of Africa that gives us some idea of what's going on in the continent," Ottenheimer said.

In order to counteract any bias, the telecourse has supplementary readings and a text called "The Africans," which is written by experts on Africa and Africans themselves. Ottenheimer said he brings to the class 20 years of personal research on Africa to counteract the bias.

First, it is important for students to understand what Africa's view of itself is. Then he explains the failings and omissions of the series, he said.

"Mazrui is guilty of some errors and omissions — about the causes of famine, the greed of governments," McCormally said. "If his critics will answer him with other programs, we'll all be richer. To have silenced him, as some apparently wanted, would have been our loss."

Ottenheimer asked the Muslim community on campus to write a one- to two-page document stating their grievances against the series. The document will be distributed to the members of the class. As with the Muslim grievance, Ottenheimer said he will present to the class the grievances of several other groups against the series.

"Africa is an extremely complex place, the most complex in the world," he said. "It (the series) is a very different perspective of Africa that most people have not had an opportunity to hear or see."

About 40 people are enrolled in the telecourse. To date, the students have enjoyed the class and the opportunity to see a different perspective of a country than they get in the normal classroom situation or through the media, Ottenheimer said.

"I think a lot is overreaction. Everyone should have the opportunity to hear many points of view," he said. "If the government ceases to let us hear many points of view, then we are in trouble. We run the risk of becoming like a bunch of natives on a small island who tend to think of themselves as the navel of the world."

dent senator and junior in education, said objectivity should be used when considering this issue.

"What you should be thinking about when you vote is not whether you're in favor of this bill because it could affect you, but whether you think the students should be asked to vote on what they think," Howard said.

White said immediate action will be taken to get the issue on February's student body election ballot.

"President Johnson has proposed setting up a task force to study this. He has indicated to me that it would not be timely to put a vote to the students," he said. "This indicates to me that the task force would be working past February election and this would not get on the ballot this time around, at least.

"I believe the last thing this government needs is another task force. I think those are the product of indecisive and irresponsible minds."

White said the next step should be a petition drive. Putting a petition on a ballot would require signatures from 10 percent of the student body.

"If we get the required number of signatures, that will put it on the ballot, barring a three-fourths override by the Senate. I don't see that happening," he said.

White said he would try to obtain 2,000 signatures before the end of the current semester.

Sources link billionaire to ransom offer

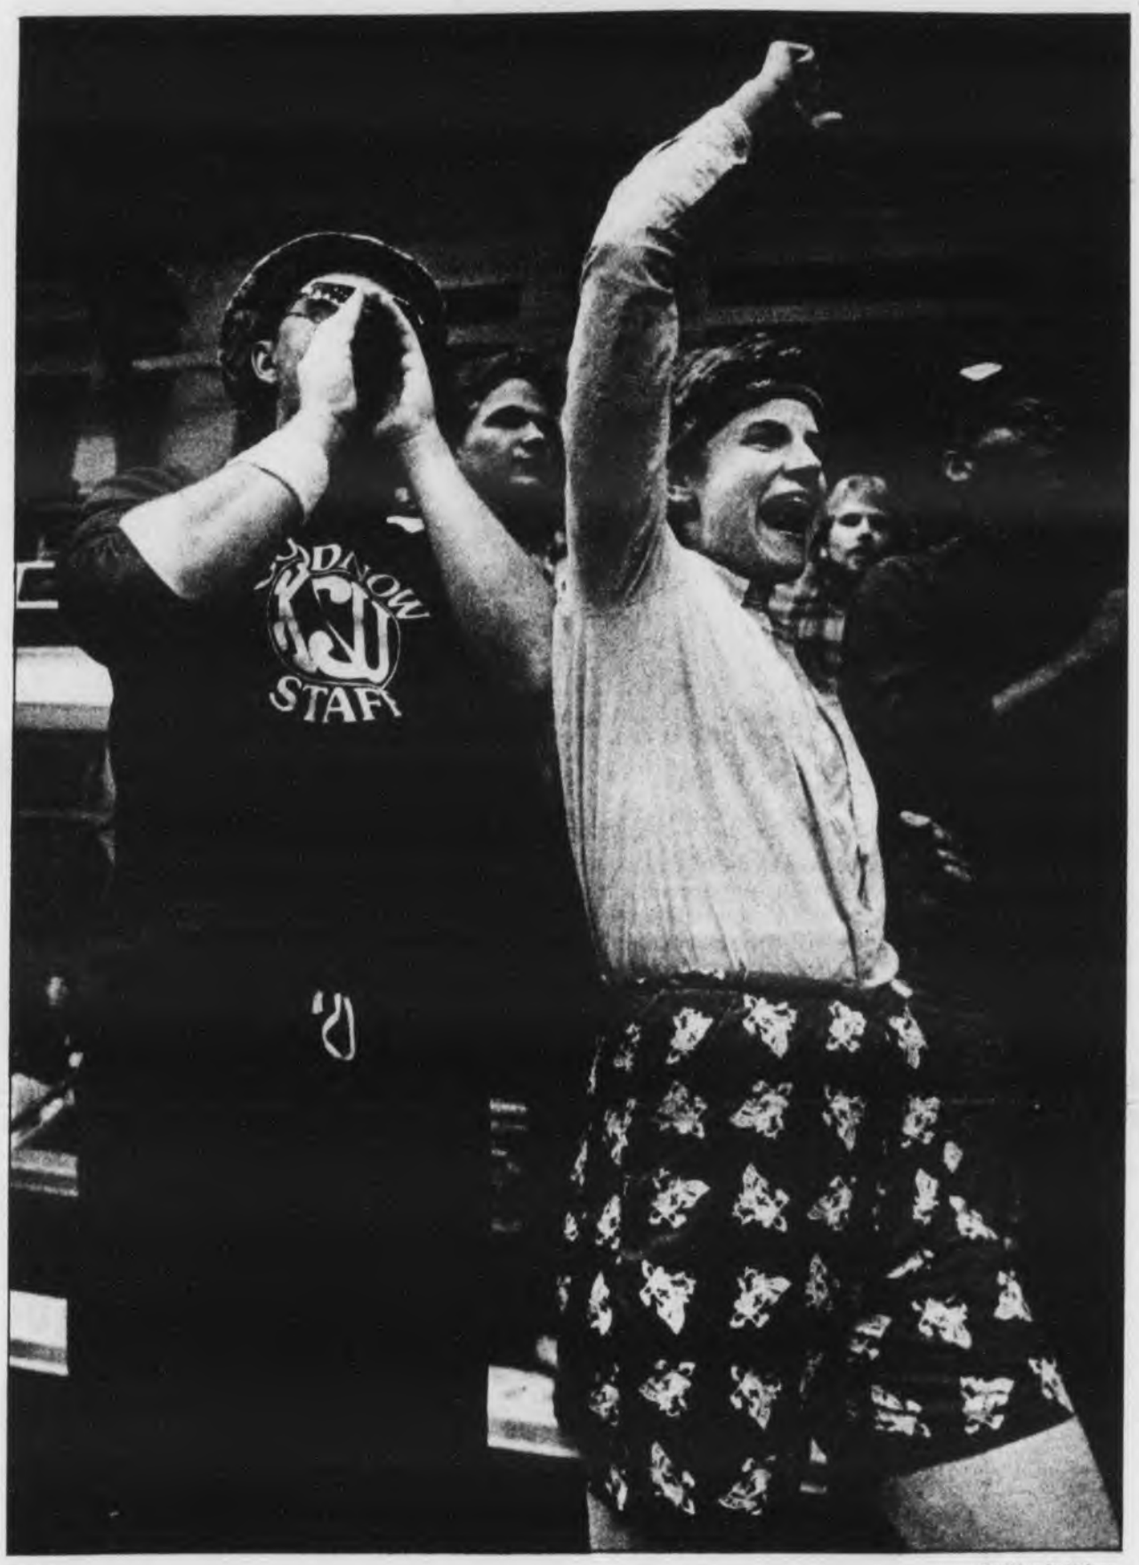
By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot, at the behest of a now-dismissed National Security Council aide, put up $2 million earlier this year to ransom five U.S. hostages in Lebanon, The Washington Post reported.

Marine Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, the NSC aide fired Nov. 25 for what the administration said was his role in funneling Iranian weapons payments to Nicaraguan Contra rebels, asked Perot on May 23 to deposit $2 million in a Swiss bank account, said the newspaper, quoting anonymous "informed sources" in Tuesday's editions.

Perot, listed by Forbes magazine as the third wealthiest American, was on the point of telexing the money when North called and asked Perot to send it by courier to Cyprus for an exchange in "a ship-to-ship transfer," the Post said.

'I will confirm that from time to time, I have responded to requests from the American government to help Americans in distress.'



— H. Ross Perot

Perot's courier waited five days on Cyprus, but the deal fell through for reasons that could not be determined, the newspaper said.

The newspaper said its information was provided by "informed sources, including people with firsthand knowledge of the transactions described."

Contacted Monday night, Daniel Howard, a White House spokesman said ransom attempt, if it occurred, was undertaken without the knowledge or authorization of the National Security Council.

Perot also could not be reached for comment, but he was quoted by the Post as saying, "I will confirm that from time to time, I have responded to requests from the American government to help Americans in distress." He declined to comment further.

Reagan allows investigation of arms deal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, saying he wants "all the facts to come out," said Monday he would welcome the appointment of a special prosecutor if it is apparent federal laws were violated in the funneling of Iranian weapons payments to Nicaraguan rebels.

Addressing a special three-man commission he established to probe the operations of his National Security Council staff, Reagan said he has ordered the staff not to participate in national security operations until the board issues its findings and recommendations.

In the past, the NSC staff has participated in White House handling of numerous crises, including the capture of the Achille Lauro hijackers and the invasion of Grenada.

In addition to the work of the special board of inquiry headed by former Sen. John Tower, R-Texas, Reagan said: "The Department of Justice investigation is continuing with my full support and cooperation, and if they determine an independent counsel is called for, I would welcome that appointment."

Attorney General Edwin Meese III, Reagan's longtime associate, is conducting the inquiry to decide whether a special prosecutor is needed.

"I want all the facts to come out," Reagan said. He added that as soon as he was told last week of the unauthorized transfers of money to the Contras, "We acted to learn the facts."

"I want to assure you and the American people that I want all the facts to come out about learning of the possible transfer of funds from the sale of arms to Iran to those fighting the Sandinista government," Reagan said as he gave the board its marching orders.

In addition to Tower, former Carter administration Secretary of State Edmund S. Muskie and former Ford administration national security adviser Brent Scowcroft are serving on the investigative board.

Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said Reagan had instructed his staff to talk openly with the board and said it has "a blank check" to conduct its work. However, he said it would not have subpoena power, would not take testimony under oath and probably would not hold public hearings, as did the presidential panel that investigated the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger.

Answering reporters questions at the close of the brief photo session as the meeting got under way in the Cabinet Room, Reagan said a suggestion that he call a special session of Congress to investigate the scandal "is under discussion."

"There has been no decision," the president said.

Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas, who met with White House Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan shortly before Reagan's session with the board, said his call for a special session was "under active consideration" at the White House.

Reagan fired North last week, and the Marine officer today reported as ordered at Marine headquarters for his new assignment.

If a special session were called now, with Republicans in control of the Senate, the GOP would have a larger voice in the panel's make up than it would after January when the new Democratic majority takes control of the Senate.

Speakes, in a briefing earlier today, said Reagan "does not have any specific problem" with Attorney General Edwin Meese leading the investigation to determine whether any laws were broken in the Iran-Contra connection.

Some members of Congress have called for appointment of a special prosecutor, noting that Meese provided legal advice to Reagan on the arms sale and is a member of the NSC.

Post office gains space, accessibility in Dykstra Hall move

By GREG LAUDICK
Collegian Reporter

The campus post office began service Monday in Dykstra Hall, leaving its 35-year home in Anderson Hall.

The post office was moved in an effort to gain office space in Anderson and centralize the University mailing system, said Fred Ferguson, director of physical facilities.

"The decision to move was made a few months ago," he said. The move was "favored by all the people involved, including department heads and student leaders," he said.

"While Anderson Hall may be considered the center of the campus socially, it is not physically," Ferguson said.

"If you look at the campus as a whole, you see that there isn't a lot of the campus on the north side, but in Dykstra's case, it is by far more centrally located physically than Anderson."

After a study of the campus was made, Dykstra was chosen for the new location because space was available in the building to accommodate the move, he said.

"Of all the buildings on campus, Dykstra offered the most space for the post office and the most accessibility for customers and federal postal vehicles," Ferguson said.

The postal units already in the Union were another factor influencing the selection of Dykstra for relocation.

"Having two postal stations so close together was really not feasible," Ferguson said. "Now, we can accommodate more of the campus than we did before."

The Union postal station can handle packages weighing up to 15 pounds. In addition, Walt Smith, director of the Union, is considering the purchase of newer stamp and envelope machines, Ferguson said.

A mailbox with drive-up accessibility is planned to be placed along Mid-Campus Drive between the Union and Anderson, he said.

Ferguson said during the decision-making process, administrators considered moving all postal facilities to the Union.

"If the new location would have been the Union, the students would have seen a reduction in the service available," Ferguson said. Limited space in the Union would have required a reduction of employees, he said.

He also said postal vehicle accessibility to the Union would have been difficult considering the parking situation in that area of campus.

In response to the move, Annette Vazquez, secretary to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said the new location is "OK for mailing our departmental letters, but if you have to get stamps or some other mail service, it is a hassle to walk that far."

Other people have expressed concern that the new location would slow down the rate of service, Ferguson said.

"People seem to believe that if you mailed your letters in Anderson, they went out earlier," he said, "but the fact of the matter is all mail is picked up from campus by the Federal Post Office at the same time."

The new location has also been criticized because it is away from the center of University administration activities in Anderson.

"I make a few trips to Anderson Hall everyday," said Matthew Wilber, junior in agronomy and employee of the Department of Agriculture. "The post office is now closer to my office in Waters Hall, but now I have to make two trips, where normally I would make one."

Ferguson said one advantage of the Dykstra location is its proximity to Ackert and Throckmorton halls where much of the off-campus and international mail is received and sent out.

The new location also provides handicapped accessibility for people who previously were unable to use postal facilities in Anderson because the building is not yet wheelchair accessible, he said.

"The people most affected by the move, really should be the people in Anderson Hall," Ferguson said. "But with the new system, I believe we can be of more service to more people at a better location."

House elects local representative to majority floor leader position

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Jim Braden, a longtime political ally of Republican Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, will become speaker of the Kansas House when the 1987 session opens Jan. 12, and Joe Knopp, a young Manhattan lawyer with half as much legislative experience, will replace Braden as majority leader.

The Republican House caucus Monday nominated Braden for speaker by acclamation, and Knopp defeated three rivals for the position of majority floor leader in the top race in either party for a leadership post.

In the only other caucus contests, Rep. Max Moomaw of Dighton won the GOP nomination to become assistant majority leader and Rep. Ken Grotewiel won the Democratic nomination for minority party caucus chairmanship.

The nominations are tantamount to election. However, those named Monday will not officially claim their offices until the House convenes in six weeks and formal votes are taken by the full 125-member house.

The new leaders will hold their offices for the 1987 and 1988 sessions.

The Kansas Senate did not reorganize this time, because senators are in the middle of four-year terms.

Besides Braden, those nominated for House leadership jobs without opposition were House Speaker Pro Tem David Heinemann of Garden City on the Republican side and Minority Leader Marvin Barkis of Louisburg, Assistant Minority Leader Donald Mainey of Topeka and Minority Whip Bill Reardon of Kansas City, Kan., on the Democratic side.

Picked to be caucus secretary for the Republicans was Rep. Dorothy Flottman of Winfield, and named Democratic agenda chairwoman was Rep. Joan Wagnon of Topeka.

Archives release Nixon papers, withhold Watergate documents

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former President Richard M. Nixon was counseled by a top aide in 1969 to avoid a visit to Coretta Scott King, wife of the black activist, on the first anniversary of her husband's assassination because "it would outrage many, many people who believe Dr. King was a fraud."

The aide, Patrick Buchanan, was a speechwriter in the Nixon White House. He is the director of communications for President Reagan.

Buchanan's memo was among 1.5 million documents from the Nixon administration made public Monday by the National Archives. It was the first release of textual material from the more than 40 million documents Nixon left behind when he resigned Aug. 9, 1974.

Missing from the newly released documents are the most sensitive of the Nixon files — those relating to the Watergate scandal that drove him from office. The National Archives once before tried to release those but was stopped by 29 lawsuits filed by former Nixon associates.

The Archives, which has custody of the Nixon materials, is expected to try again next month to open the papers to public scrutiny. The law requires that a notice of such release be published in the Federal Register and that any persons who object have 60 days to do so.

Buchanan's memo, written on April 1, 1969, said Nixon should observe the first anniversary of the civil rights leader's death by doing no more than isuing a statement.

India vows to avenge massacre

NEW DELHI, India — Hindus rioted and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi pledged "tough and strong action" against Sikh terrorists Monday, the day after four gunmen pulled Hindus off a bus in Punjab and killed 24 of them.

Police said Sikh militants killed eight more people in Punjab state Monday.

Sikh extremists, who want independence for Punjab, killed 14 Hindus in a similar bus hijacking July 25.

Paramilitary troops were ordered to patrol New Delhi during a general strike called for Tuesday by an opposition Hindu political party. Strikes also were scheduled in the Hindu-dominated states of Haryana and Kashmir next to Punjab, which has a Sikh majority.

Shops were closed Monday by general strikes in towns and cities throughout Punjab. Clashes between Sikh and Hindu youths were reported in Jallundhar, but police said no serious injuries resulted.

About 3,000 Hindus rioted and threw stones on the edge of New Delhi. Police fired shots into the air and lobbed tear gas to scatter the crowds.

Officers said they arrested 100 people for trying to block traffic on the main ring road around the capital.

FmHA needs policies, expert says

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Farmers Home Administration must pursue new policies to strengthen its loan portfolio in the wake of $6.8 billion in delinquent farm loans and $250 million in loan losses in fiscal 1986, according to an official at the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City.

"The magnitude of the loan deliquencies and loan losses the FmHA faces establishes a clear need for actions to stem the mounting problems," wrote assistant economist Kim Norris in the Fed's November Economic Review.

The FmHA provides credit to farmers who are unable to obtain it anywhere else.

In the last 10 years, overall farm debt has increased by 120 percent. Farm debt held by the FmHA has increased 400 percent, Norris said.

The softening farm commodities market, bad weather and deregulation of financial institutions are some reasons for the rapid growth in the FmHA portfolio, Norris said.

In an effort to curb the problem, the FmHA may again foreclose on seriously delinquent loans. However, when foreclosures began in 1983, many of the borrowers sued and a federal court stopped almost all FmHA foreclosures, Norris said.

Astronaut receives brigadier stars

TOPEKA — Astronaut Joe Engle, a native of Chapman who retired Sunday from the Air Force, Monday was commissioned a brigadier general in the Kansas National Guard by State Adjutant Ralph Tice during a ceremony in Gov. John Carlin's office.

"It's a great day for Kansas," Carlin said after he and Engle's sister, Betty Poland of Chapman, pinned single silver stars on each of Engle's shoulders. Engle retired from the Air Force with the rank of colonel.

"Undoubtedly this is the highlight of my eight years as commander and chief (of the National Guard)," Carlin added.

After the ceremony in the governor's office, Engle was introduced to members of the Kansas House of Representatives who were in Topeka Monday for a pre-organizational meeting.

"To me it's an extremely rare privilege and honor...to have the opportunity, after nearly 31 years in the Air Force, to retire and be appointed to my state's National Guard," Engle told the House.

He told those at the ceremony in Carlin's office, "I don't think there is anything that could make me feel more proud or more fortunate than to continue to serve my country and my state."

Court convicts Jonestown member

SAN FRANCISCO — Larry Layton, the only former Peoples Temple member to be tried in this country, was convicted Monday of conspiring in the murder of Rep. Leo Ryan, an act that triggered the mass murder-suicide by the Rev. Jim Jones' followers in a South American jungle eight years ago.

A federal jury also convicted Layton, 40, of aiding and abetting in the murder of Ryan and of conspiracy and aiding and abetting in the attempted murder of Richard Dwyer, a U.S. diplomat wounded in the attack.

"This man was a killer," U.S. Attorney Joseph Russoniello told reporters after the verdict. He took part in the plot "because he was a believer."

Layton's first trial, in 1981, ended in a hung jury. He has been free on bail and has been working in a local community under an alias.

Chief U.S. District Judge Robert Peckham scheduled sentencing for Jan. 23. The conspiracy charges and the charge of aiding and abetting in Ryan's murder carry maximum penalties of life in prison.

Layton, who admitted shooting and wounding two dissident temple members who were trying to leave with Ryan, was convicted of taking part in a plot by Jones to keep Ryan and his party from reaching the outside world with news of conditions at the cult's settlement of Jonestown in Guyana.

GM to buy back stock from Perot

DETROIT — General Motors Corp. agreed Monday to buy back the stock of its largest shareholder and most vocal critic, Electronic Data Systems Corp. founder H. Ross Perot, and the Texas billionaire agreed to resign as chairman of the GM subsidiary.

GM also said EDS, which it bought two years ago for $2.5 billion, will be incorporated into a new group along with subsidiaries Hughes Aircraft Co., Delco Electronics and GM's defense operations.

The announcement by GM Chairman Roger Smith followed a GM board meeting in New York, where members voted for the buyout in exchange for Perot's resignation as EDS chairman and member of GM's board.

"It seems that GM was willing to pay a lot to get him (Perot) off the board and off their backs," said industry analyst Harvey Heinbach of Merrill Lynch in New York.

The board approved the purchase of all 12 million GM Class E shares owned by Perot and three other top EDS executives — Morton H. Meyerson, J. Thomas Walter Jr. and William K. Gayden — for $33 a share, or $400 million. The board also agreed to pay contingencies, totaling $350 million, agreed upon when GM bought EDS.

GM spokesman Cliff Merriott was unable to break down the package but said Perot's share came to $700 million.

Key witness reverses testimony

LOS ANGELES — A key witness in the "Twilight Zone" manslaughter trial reversed himself Monday and supported a prosecution theory that a last-minute change in a helicopter's course preceded the crash that killed actor Vic Morrow and two children.

The reversal came early in afternoon testimony by James Camomile, a special-effects technician whom the defense blames for the crash.

The prosecution claims the helicopter's course was changed to bring it closer to the explosives for increased dramatic effect.

Attorneys for director John Landis and four other defendants maintain that Camomile was not paying attention to the Vietnam War scene being shot and fired his bombs before Morrow and the children were out of the line of fire.

"Did you ever testify it was not?" asked Deputy District Attorney Lea Purwin D'Agostino.

"I can't say for sure," replied Camomile.

D'Agostino, apparently surprised by his statement, asked for a recess to consult her notes on Camomile's previous accounts of the incident.

Business professor teaches, researches entrepreneur's ideas

By LISA CARLIN
Collegian Reporter

Entrepreneur is a word many people have probably heard but few really understand. Robert Brockhaus, professor of management, defines entrepreneur as a person who creates a business with a real growth potential.

Brockhaus is the L.L. McAninch Chair of Entrepreneurship at K-State. In this position, he is responsible for teaching, research, program development and public speaking about entrepreneurship. He is the first person to hold this position, which is named for the head of Research Products Co. of Salina, an international firm dealing with custom fumigation and insect control for grain storage. It was established by McAninch's wife, three daughters and their husbands. The Wichita State University also has a major program in entrepreneurship, he said.

Brockhaus said most businesses created by entrepreuners are in high tech areas, such as the development of Apple Computers. However, such endeavors could be in any type of business, he said.

Brockhaus has performed extensive research in the area of entrepreneurship and as a result of his research, has been recently named to "Who's Who in the World," published by the Marquis group.

His research on entrepreneurs found that, in general, entrepreneurs are moderate risk takers. He said this counters the general belief most people hold that entrepreneurs take more risks than a member of the general public. In fact, Brockhaus said, his research showed that an entrepreneur's risk-taking decisions were in general no different from the decisions of a manager or a member of the general public.

But entrepreneurs have an internal focus of control, meaning they think they can affect the outcome of decisions. And, he said, entrepreneurs tend to have a high need for achievement.

To conduct his research, Brockhaus used a questionnaire containing 12 situations for the respondent to consider. Some of the situations were business-oriented while others were general list situations. All contained a certain amount of risk.

Although entrepreneurs often take no more risks than members of the general public, Brockhaus said, they often are those people "pushed" by their jobs by being laid off or passed over for a promotions.

Two-thirds of the people who decide to start their own business make the decision without knowing what the business will be. As a result, he said, many of these people may not know a lot about the business they eventually decide to enter.

Often these people want to "escape" from the kind of business or occupation with which they are currently involved, he said. Brockhaus' research, in addition to the research of others, has demonstrated this point.

Brockhaus gave several hints for people thinking about beginning business, including finding a business most people do not think of, finding a business that requires a skill a common person does not have and looking for a business with a high financial cost. The high cost will keep other people from getting into the business. Looking at industries with increasing growth curves and ones that would not take business away from other companies is also helpful, he said.

But even if one develops a successful business, he said problems can occur because once a business is successful, everyone else will try to copy it and improve on it.

While at K-State, Brockhaus teaches both undergraduate and graduate courses in entrepreneurship, as well as a course called Small Business Institute. He said in his entrepreneurship classes, about 40-50 percent of the students enrolled were from colleges other than business administration. Brockhaus also focuses a great deal of his time on various research projects, including a study on how small businesses utilize consultants.

Since coming to campus in January, Brockhaus said, he was impressed by Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration, and his commitment to the program. Brockhaus is also the adviser for the Chapter of the Association of Collegiate Entrepreneurs at K-State.

Professor likes to keep 'total control'

By STEVE BRADY
Collegian Reporter

When students enter his lecture room, they had better be prepared to sit and listen. Questions are not allowed to be asked, and he has total control of the floor.

This is the way Richard P. Coleman, professor of marketing, teaches his classes. Nobody speaks in his lecture but himself.

"I teach a formal class and I like to be in control of it," he said.

However, Coleman, who teaches Consumer Behavior, said he feels sorry for any teacher who does not have any sort of relationship with their students.

"I can not stand to be in front of a class for a whole semester and not know who my students are," Coleman said.

In order to find out some qualities of the students, Coleman has them write a paper called "Self-Introduction As A Student and Consumer." Forty percent of the grade on the paper is based on an autobiographical sketch of that person.

The other 60 percent of the grade is based on a description of a recent product they have purchased. Coleman said this helps him understand his students' personalities.

He said some of the students are lazy and write only one or two pages, but he does get some papers as long as 20 pages.

After reading all the papers, Coleman has a 15-minute appointment with each student so he can ge acquainted with them and find out more about them. Last year, 125 out of 127 students talked with him and 195 out of 199 students did so this year, Coleman said.

"He's a real likeable guy," said Mike McQueen, senior in journalism and mass communications, who had Consumer Behavior in the spring of 1986. "I thought it was neat he knew more about us than we knew he would."

Staff/Robert Squires

Richard P. Coleman, professor of marketing, talks with Tina Blasi, junior in business administration, after Coleman's Consumer Behavior class.

Coleman said he became fascinated with people's names early in life. He said his mother was active in social affairs and she would always talk about people she had never met.

"It's fun. It adds so much to life," he said of people's names. When he was in college, he said he wrote the "secret gossip column" for the school newspaper.

"I'm sworn with names," Coleman said. "Seeing a person's name is important to me to get a feeling or description of what the person is like.

"Every time I put a student's score in the grade book, I put that name in my mind and I get a mental picture of them. The meetings I have with my students also help me to know their names.

"The first thing I do when someone calls me is to look in the student directory in order to find out a little more about that person. I want to be able to relate to that person a little more. I want to be able to put them in a context, into a social network."

Coleman said he is bothered when students relate to other students on a first-name basis only and don't even know what each others' last names are.

"The more context you have about them, the more you know," Coleman said.

Since he has been here, Coleman has taught about 2,100 students in Consumer Behavior. Out of all of them, he said he has probably disliked about 14.

"My students don't have to be receiving an 'A' for me to like them," he said. "I keep in touch with a lot of my students. I exchange Christmas cards with about 50 to 55 previous students of mine each year.

"Every two or three days a previous student calls me to talk. It's not always idle chitchat. Sometimes it is business."

Coleman came to K-State in the summer of 1981. He did motivational research at Social Research Inc. in Chicago from 1957 to 1969.

K-State ranks in poll of top 'party colleges'

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Playboy has done it again. First, it was "The Women of the Big Eight," and now, just when students thought it was safe to party in obscurity, the "international magazine for men" has ranked K-State among the Top 40 party colleges in the United States.

The University had the distinction of being chosen the 27th best party college. The University of Kansas slightly edged out K-State by claiming the 26th ranking. Topping the list was California State University in Chico, Calif., and rounding out the rankings was Fairhaven College, Bellingham, Wash.

Oklahoma State University was ranked 19th to lead the Big Eight party schools. The University of Oklahoma was the only other conference representative in the rankings at 32.

Playboy summarizes K-State as "the agricultural party school that projects a good ol' hell-raising image." The ranking goes on to quote an unnamed source as saying, "We're wild Western-campus kids in a half-inch of cow ----."

Playboy interviewed campus club leaders, fraternity presidents and other campus socialites at more the 250 colleges nationwide to determine the upper echelons of inebriation.

Student reaction to the ranking varied. Some believed the No. 27 spot was too low for the University.

"I would say that we are in the top 10 in the country," said Larry Malm, junior in business administration. "We have a pretty good tradition of being a party school."

Others believed the recent publicity over the post-KU game Aggieville disturbance put the school in a false light.

"I think that we have been getting a lot of publicity lately, but I don't think we are any more of a party college than anyone else," said Judy Darling, senior in business management. "I think there are better things we could be known for other than being a party college."

K-State sports fans, "Kansas boys," are also credited with throwing plucked chickens onto basketball courts during games. The article further explains that K-Staters conduct "after-game, car-ramming riots in the parking lot."

"I can't say that it hasn't happened, but it hasn't been reported to us," said K-State Police Lt. Robert Mellgren, who has been on the force for 12 years.

One K-State fraternity was singled out in the "Stupid Frat Tricks" section of the article. "If you strike out at a Beta Theta Pi party, you'll wake up with a mannequin in your bed."

"It's a lie," said Beta President Gib Benschoter, first-year student in veterinary medicine, when asked the accuracy of the article. "I don't know where they picked it up at."

"Most guys laughed at it and said we must have fun at our parties because none of us have ever woken up with a mannequin," he said.

The Beta's hope the commotion caused by the "revelation" in Playboy will quickly subside, he said.

Court may detain highway funds of states with lower drinking ages

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court Monday agreed to decide whether some federal highway money may be withheld from states that fail to adopt a minimum drinking age of 21.

The justices said they will hear arguments by South Dakota authorities that such a federal law unconstitutionally weakens state powers.

Congress in 1984 passed a law requiring the secretary of transportation to withhold part of the federal money otherwise available to a state for highway construction if the state permits "the purchase or public possession...of any alcoholic beverage" by someone under 21.

The law is aimed at reducing drunken driving by teen-agers, a major cause of death among that age group.

Under the law, those states with a minimum drinking age under 21 lose 5 percent of the highway funds otherwise due for fiscal year 1987 and 10 percent of such funds during fiscal year 1988.

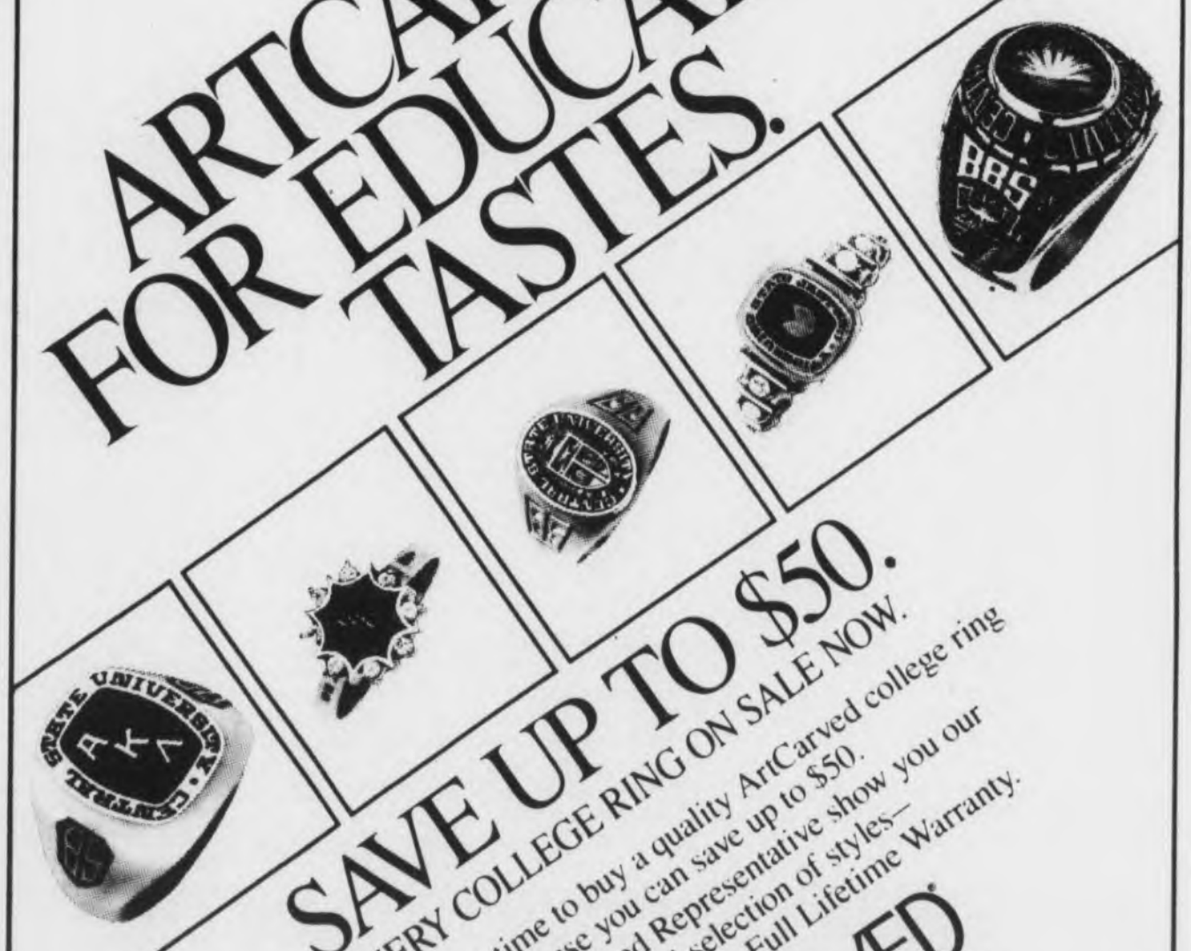
States that subsequently adopt a 21-year minimum drinking age may be entitled to recoup withheld funds.

South Dakota sued Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth H. Dole shortly after the law was enacted in an effort to block any reduction in funds.

The state permits people 19 and 20 years old to purchase and publicly possess beer containing a low percentage of alcohol.

U.S. District Judge Andrew Bogue of Rapid City, S.D., dismissed the state's lawsuit, and the dismissal was upheld last May 21 by the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

In other cases Monday the Supreme Court:



— Allowed states to require drug and alcohol tests for people involved in thoroughbred horse racing. The court, without comment, rejected an appeal by five well-known jockeys who said breathalyzer and urine tests required by New Jersey racing officials violate their constitutional rights.

— Rejected the appeal of a Hollywood movie studio that lost a trademark battle to a Japanese video game company.

Convention may help state image, economy

There's no better place for the 1988 national political conventions than Kansas City.

If the Kansas City Visitors and Convention Bureau is successful in bringing one of the conventions to the city, the pay off would be about $12 million, according to Gil Langley, director of marketing for the bureau.

Kansas City remains on the list of contenders for a convention among such cities as Philadelphia, Houston, Atlanta, New Orleans, New York and Washington.

The Republican Party will soon narrow its choice to three cities from its list of Kansas City, St. Louis, Detroit, Atlanta, Houston, New Orleans, Seattle, Las Vegas and Los Angeles.

Kansas City has received support from political leaders Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., and Kansas Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Wichita. Some Missouri legislators also favor Kansas City as a national convention site.

This support is proper coming from Kansas and Missouri leaders. Other cities in Kansas including Wichita, Topeka and Salina, have been working to develop facilities to attract conventions. If Kansas City becomes the host of one of the national conventions, other conventions will look to this area as a meeting place.

The Kansas City Visitors and Convention Bureau has been lobbying strongly in Washington, D.C., spending more than $100,000 in its promotion efforts. These efforts must be supported by Kansas congressmen and economic leaders. If Kansas can become a convention center, the benefits to the state will be countless.

Geographically, Kansas is the ideal location for conventions. With recent passage of liquor by the drink and pari-mutuel wagering, no entertainment obstacles remain. Although Kansas City, Mo., would be the likely location for a national convention, it's a good place to start.

President's veto favors democracy

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

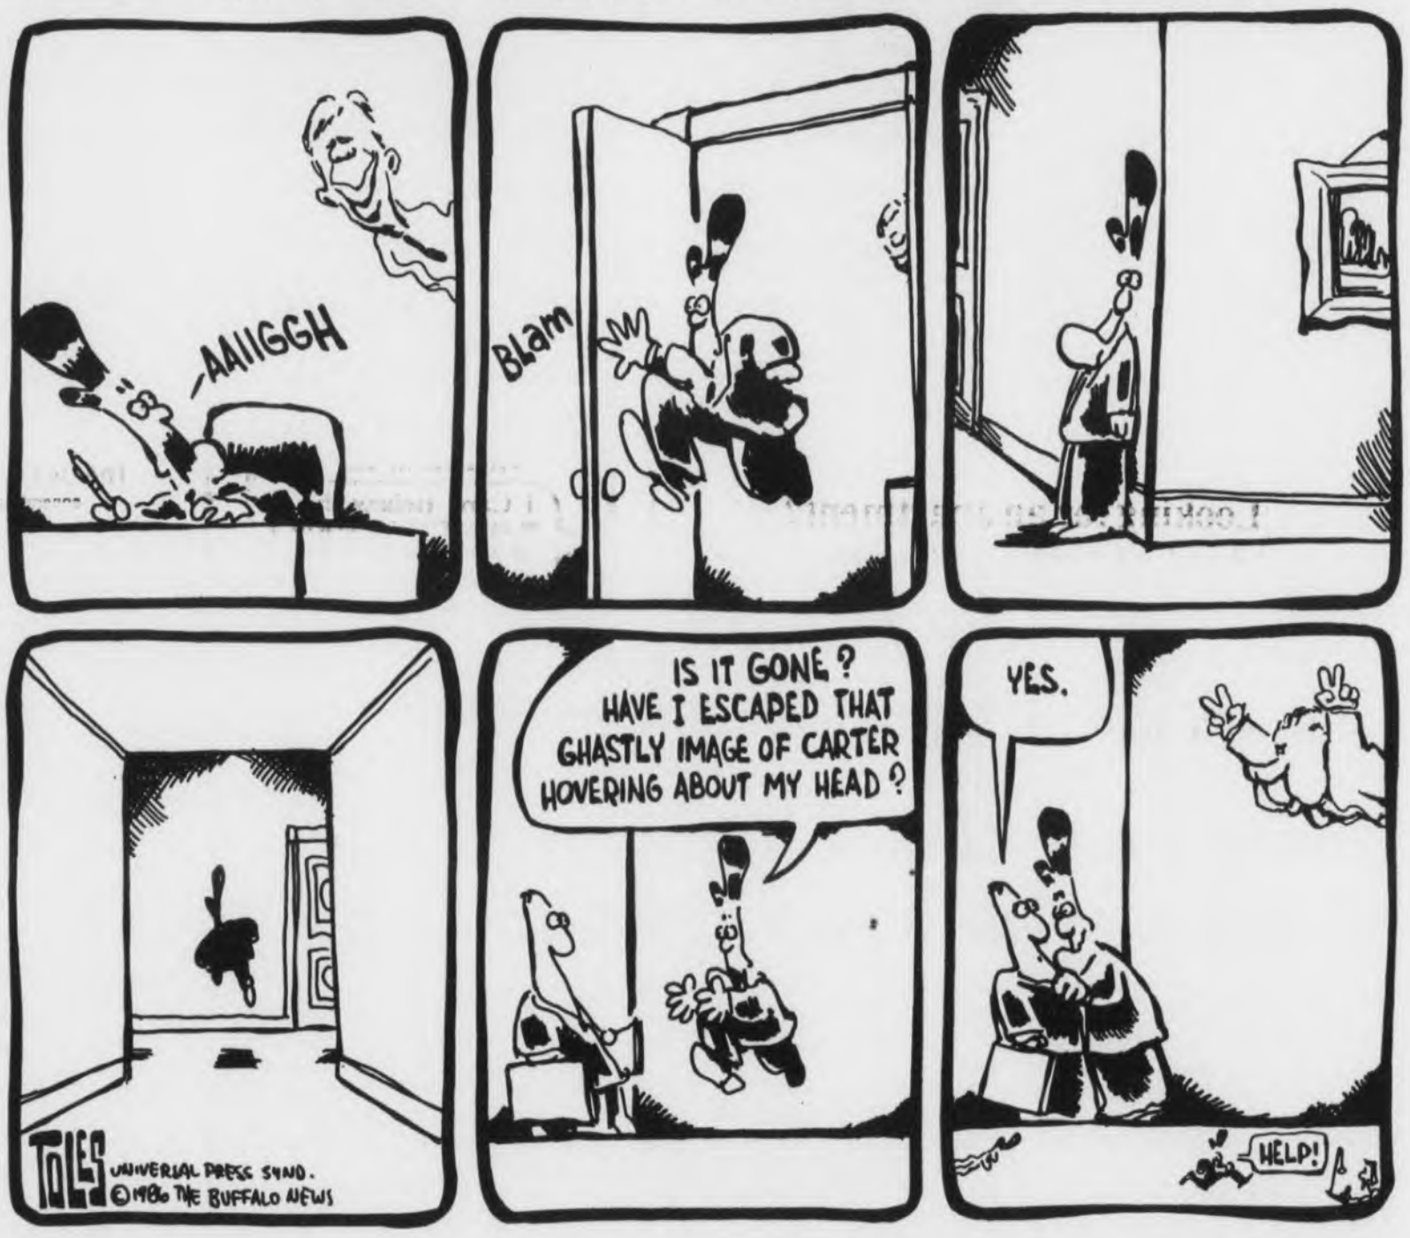
Student Body President Steven Johnson's veto of the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum bill may appear to be denying K-Staters democracy by not allowing them to vote on this referndum. However, a closer look will show that his actions are unquestionably in defense of democratic principles for students.

The vetoed resolution proposed to change the representation of Student Senate from its current system, where representation is based on colleges, to a system where representation is based on both colleges and on living districts (greek, off-campus, and University housing). Hence, half of the senators will represent a college and half will represent a living group.

The reasoning behind this resolution is that the current system of representation doesn't provide true representation of the student population. Supporters of the resolution base their argument on the fact that the high percentage of senators living in greek housing is not proportional to the student population. If the resolution was in effect, the number of greek students serving in Senate would have to be reduced as room would have to be made for off-campus and University housing. The supporters believe their resolution would eliminate an unfair advantage given to greek students running for Student Senate.

In reality, the resolution and the reasons for it are one big myth. No student is denied the opportunity to run for Student Senate. The only limitations are the number of senators allotted to each college — which in no way is unfair because representation is divided equally by population in each college. Furthermore, steps have been taken to prevent inequities of opportunity from occurring by limiting the amount of money a student may spend on his or her Senate campaign. This way, students can't buy their seat on Student Senate. In other words, there is no way that a bunch of "rich greek kids" can take control of Senate.

Lee White, a co-sponsor of the Representation Enhancement Referendum, said, "I think our Student Senate believes in democracy, and I wish our student body president did, too." But he and the rest of this bill's supporters fail to realize that the people who are on Student Senate were elected democratically. As a Student Senate candidate and a residence hall resident last year, I personally know that I was never at an unfair disadvantage because of the way Student Senate representation is divided. I lost my Student Senate race fair and square — and, most importantly, democratically.



When students went to the polls, they voted for the various candidates because they found merit in their abilities to perform as responsible and effective elected representatives. The fact that such a large number of senators live in a fraternity or sorority is merely a coincidence in respect to the system of representation we now have. Because this system is not based on the individual's living arrangements, it is impossible for greeks to have an unfair advantage.

If there are any true inequities in the way people in living groups are represented, it is not a result of the way this representation is divided. Instead, it is a result of voter turnout of the various groups. The success of greeks in making up a large percentage of Student Senate is a result of their ability to bring in voters in their living districts and capitalize on the apathy of other living groups.

Supporters of this amendment claim that if the current method is democratic and has enabled greek students to capitalize on non-greek apathy, then the referendum will face the same apathy which will allow greeks to effectively turn out a "no" vote. Once again, I disagree with their argument. The referendum will create a special circumstance where off-campus and University housing will bring out their voters for this one election because it will create a windfall of permanent Senate seats for them. After the election, they will return to their old apathetic ways, and have in their possession a permanent holding of unearned Senate seats. This surely would not be in the interest of democracy.

It is my belief that those students who are active in student government should run student government. If a group of students believe they are not fully represented, then they need to get active in student affairs so that they will be represented.

If Student Senate representation is to be enhanced, perhaps changes should be made in the availability of voting places for students. For example, if voting places were located closer to residence halls, then students living there would probably vote in higher numbers. This would certainly be an enhancement of democracy.

Reagan suspected of illegal activity

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

The Reagan presidency is in trouble. His "Ronbo" style of foreign policy has finally blown up in his face. The Iranian arms deal and its connection to the Nicaraguan Contra rebels has obliterated any hope that Ronald Reagan's last two years in office will be quiet ones.

The first thing to surface was the arms sale to Iran to free hostages in Lebanon. The president went on national television twice in one week and told the American people that a deal was made with certain moderate factions within the Iranian government to sell them weapons. According to Reagan, this was not a trade of arms for hostages, but a goodwill gesture to re-establish friendly relations with Iran. As a goodwill gesture toward the United States, these moderate factions would then convince the Islamic Jihad to release American hostages.

Doubts have begun to grow about the assertion that deals were made with moderates. The weapons sold to Iran are to be used in the Iranian army which is controlled by Ayatolla Khomeini, who is anything but moderate.

A question of legality arises in the arms sale. The Arms Export Control Act requires all arms shipments to be licensed by the State Department. The president neglected to obtain this license before shipping arms to Iran. In fact, he neglected to tell Secretary of State George Shultz about the deal.

Another problem has to do with the amount of weapons sent. The Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress and the Department of Defense be notified in advance of any shipment worth more than $14 million. The question is, how many weapons did Reagan send to Iran? If he sent more than $14 million, Reagan may become our first jailbird president.

Can the president of the United States be thrown in prison for illegally shipping arms to Iran? I don't see why not. Several private citizens have been charged with trying to ship arms to Iran. One person is currently serving a prison sentence for that very crime. If private citizens can be put in jail for selling arms to Iran, then the president should be subject to the same punishment.

Then, we arrive at the Nicaraguan connection. The Reagan administration announced that up to $30 million may have been illegally funneled to the Contra rebels. They claim former National Security Advisor John Poindexter and his aide, Lt. Col. Oliver North, acted alone without consulting other members of the White House staff.

The consensus now is the president lost control and a few overambitious staff members got carried away. I don't believe this to be true. A matter as important and potentially destructive as the Iranian arms deal would be at the top of any president's agenda. I don't believe that even Reagan could do something as stupid as misplace $30 million in profits from a possibilly illegal arms deal, only to find the money going to his favorite cause in Central America. Reagan may be self-centered, egotistical, manipulative and evil, but he's no fool.

Even if the president didn't know the details of the Contra connection, he is indirectly at fault. The Boland Amendment prohibits the administration from directly or indirectly aiding the Contras. While there is room for doubt on the issue of direct aid, Reagan has at least aided the Contras indirectly. He sits and watches these so-called private organizations give money and weapons to these people. Just where do you draw the line on indirect aid? No one can argue that the president set the environment for this money laundering scheme to take place.

And then there's George Bush. The vice president has tried to stay clear of this scandal, for he has his eyes on the 1988 presidential election. This may not last for long. When the cargo plane carrying Eugene Hasenfus was shot down in Nicaragua Oct. 5, there were allegations that the operation was funded by the United States and run by Vice President Bush. A character named Max Gomez reportedly met with Bush. According to Hasenfus, Gomez was in charge of Hasenfus' cargo flight.

These discoveries about secret funding put the Hasenfus case in a new light. In the cargo plane's wreckage, several papers were found. Included in these is a business card bearing the name of a Swiss bank officer and what may be an account number. If this card can be connected to the money diverted from the Iranian arms sale, then a new link to the upper levels of the administration may be made.

It looks like there may be some major changes going on in the government. The one thing the Iranian arms deal has done that no other scandal has in Reagan's term, was to upset both Republicans and Democrats. Even people on the far right are criticizing the president for these actions. If any of these investigations turn up evidence of crimes being committed, Reagan doesn't have a prayer of serving his last two years. He may be joined in exile by the vice president and the rest of the cabinet.

Athletics needs funds

Editor,

We need an athletic fee. Everyone gripes and complains that academics are the most important part of our University so we shouldn't have to dole out more money for athletics at fee payment time. I totally agree that academics are important, but whether you like it or not, our athletic program gets media attention.

If academics are the foundation on which the University is built, then athletics is the window through which the University is seen. Now, our academic foundation is solid, but our window is small and blurry. We can make this window larger and the image sharp and clear by the implementation of an athletic fee. It doesn't need to be $30, $20 or even $15. A fee of $7-10 certainly would be a start.

The athletic fee is not a cure-all for our athletic fee blues. However, it is going to start the ball rolling toward better alumni support, better TV games (which bring in even more revenue) and a better athletic program. It's going to be our decision. I hope we make the right one.

No to death penalty

Editor,

The issue of capital punishment will be one of the major topics of the newly elected governor of Kansas, Mike Hayden. I believe this will be a step in the wrong direction for the state if the death penalty is passed.

There is much opposition to the death penalty not only in Kansas, but in many states which have already adopted it. Before we make a mistake and support capital punishment, I believe we should be aware of some of this opposition. For one, capital punishment does not deter crime. Statistics show that the crime rate rises after highly published execution cases. This is a fact in not only the United States, but in other countries as well.

We outlawed slavery with the 13th Amendment in 1865 with the intention of eliminating discrimination against blacks. The death penalty does not support this amendment. Capital punishment is very discriminatory against black people. Since the death penalty has been in effect (1930), there have been almost 500 people executed for rape. Of these 500, more than 400 have been black.

Not only is capital punishment discriminatory against blacks, it is also highly discriminatory against the poor. Poor people cannot afford the experienced lawyers who can get them off the hook. Poor people are assigned inexperienced lawyers who have little or no familiarity with capital trials.

Another main issue with the death penalty is that it actually costs more to the state than incarceration. There are many appeals by the defendant when the trials are brought to the courts. These appeals are lengthy, and can cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. As a taxpayer to the state, I do not want to pay for lengthy trials.

Still another fact is that prisoners who are in prison for life can work and help to eliminate some of the costs that death row prisoners do not do. This work is useful to the state and is a lot more difficult for the prisoner to cope with than a few minutes in the death chair. Therefore, I believe that is worse punishment.

If these are not enough reasons to keep the death penalty out of Kansas, consider this. We have made mistakes in trials before and will continue to error in the future, and we could execute an innocent person.

If these facts are not enough to convince you that capital punishment should not be passed in Kansas, we might as well go back to slavery. Our fine state will not ever be free of any forms of discrimination if we allow such discriminatory and unjust laws to be passed.

State to review farm preservation act

Supreme Court to decide bill's merit

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — In a case that may limit what the Legislature can do to help troubled farmers, the Federal Land Bank of Wichita will ask the Kansas Supreme Court to declare the state's Family Farm Preservation Act unconstitutional.

The court has set aside all afternoon Thursday to hear arguments in the appeal of two foreclosure cases in which a trial court judge ruled that several sections of the Farm Preservation Act were in violation of the constitution.

The law, passed by the 1986 session of the Legislature, allows insolvent farmers to delay execution of mortgage foreclosure judgments against their land for up to three years while they make attempts to restructure the debts. In the interim, the farmers are required only to make partial interest payments.

The farm foreclosure appeal stems from a ruling by Washington County District Judge Richard Wahl that the law impairs pre-existing contracts and takes property away from farm lenders without due process. Other trial judges, however, have upheld the constitutionality of the law.

Another issue in the case is the legality of a provision that makes the law apply retroactively to some 1985 foreclosures. While the appeal is pending before the state's highest court, Attorney General Robert T. Stephan has urged Kansas judges to delay decisions in similar cases.

Last summer, Wahl granted the Federal Land Bank a judgment of $296,490 plus interest of 15.75 percent against Delwin Bott of Washington County.

In the other case, Wahl granted a $250,419 foreclosure judgment to the bank plus the same rate of interest on Republic County land mortgaged by Clarence and Ethel Nelson.

Local sales increase; holiday aids retailers

By CAROL LENKNER
Collegian Reporter

The spirit of giving is being reflected locally in retail sales this holiday season.

According to several Manhattan merchants, 1986 has been a very good year for sales, with the current holiday season proving to be the busiest time of year for them.

"From November to January, sales are 50 percent higher over other times of the year," said Cindy Sargent, assistant manager of Wal-Mart Discount Store, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd. "Our main sales are in the Christmas department, which includes items such as trees, lights and decorations."

"I've noticed that people have started shopping earlier," said Joe Bozada, manager of the Manhattan JC Penney store, Fourth and Houston streets.

Shoppers already have been out for two or three weeks, Bozada said, noting that consumers typically begin their holiday shopping immediately after Thanksgiving. They also are doing more comparison shopping this year, he said. Many write down articles they are considering so they can look around before buying.

Jo Tranter, manager of Kitchens Plus, 1310 Westloop Place, said she also has noticed customers are being more selective.

"It may be due to the economy," Tranter said. "They're really budgeting their dollars out."

People seem to be buying more practical items this year, she said. They are buying items that are nice and decorative, but at the same time useful.

There has been an interest in locally made items lately, Tranter said.

"I think people are becoming aware that it is important to support our own economy," she said.

Microwaves, video cassette recorders and compact disc players were a few of the items merchants mentioned as being good sellers this holiday season.

For children, toys such as laser games and electronic items seem to be big sellers.

"It depends mostly on what the child wants," said Mike Hufnagel, manager of the Manhattan K-Mart Discount Store, 401 E. Poyntz Ave.

"If the child sees an item on television and asks for it, more than likely, that's what he'll get," Hufnagel said.

Calendars and Christmas ornaments are popular items among college students, said Bryan Taylor, manager of The Palace, 704 N. Manhattan Ave.

For The Palace, sales really begin to climb when the students come back from Thanksgiving.

Although sales are up, merchants said they don't notice a big increase in the use of credit.

"More credit is being used than in past years, but not by a significant amount," Taylor said. "There may be more credit used the closer it gets to Christmas, but most people still have money left right now."

Cookbook to include recipes for children

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

What's cookin' at the K-State Child Care Cooperative? A cookbook for elementary school age children.

"Kids in the Kitchen" is a joint fund-raising project undertaken by the cooperative and the Kansas Home Economics Association.

Recipes have been provided by members of the cooperative and consist of nutritious, easy to prepare foods which involve little to no assistance, said co-op member Kathy Swenson.

Swenson is in the process of testing the recipes for "do-ability" and appeal to children. She said the recipes will be kept short and simple, and will be tested on children of several age levels to determine whether they like the foods and whether they have the equipment in their homes to make them.

The recipes can also demonstrate independence for a child, Swenson said.

Jennifer Kendall, graduate student in statistics and parent-member of the co-op, said the cookbook is a good idea because "there aren't that many (children's) cookbooks out there.

"It is a fund-raiser which will continue to bring in funds (for the cooperative)," Kendall said.

She submitted simple recipes which would allow she and her 2-year-old son to spend quality time together.

Co-op member Jana Hesser, assistant specialist in the Division of Continuing Education, will handle the production aspects of the cookbook. Hesser said parents have volunteered to assist with graphics and illustrations to be included in the book.

The cooperative is responsible for development and production of the book, while the KHEA is in charge of marketing aspects. Profits from the sale of the cookbook will be divided equally between the respective organizations.

Hesser is expecting the cookbook to be ready for print by mid-March and be readily available for sale in April at the KHEA state meeting. The KHEA will also market the book at national and local chapter meetings, while the cooperative attempts to market the book locally, she said.

Both Hesser and Swenson said they feel the cookbook has great potential and anticipate a large demand. If it proves to be a success, Hesser said the cooperative might produce other books, including those with non-food items such as Play-Doh.

The cooperative services nearly 180 children of K-State students, faculty and staff. Hesser said the cooperative's ultimate goal is to raise funds to subsidize the cost of childcare for students who are unable to afford it.

Local craftsmen to display handmade holiday creations during council's annual sale

By The Collegian Staff

More than a thousand people are expected to view the wares of 43 area craftsmen as they get a start on holiday shopping Thursday and Friday at the annual Arts and Crafts Sale sponsored by the Union Program Council Arts Committee. The exhibits will be in the Main and West ballrooms of the Union.

Stained glass, handmade ornaments, watercolor paintings and other original works will be on the selling block. The arts committee requires the artwork to be handmade to ensure that the event unlike a flea market, said Marilyn Woodward, arts committee adviser.

Most of the crafts are less than $10. Some items, such as small ornaments, could sell for under $1 while some stained glass pieces could reach $50, she said.

Response by exhibitors was strong and all of the display areas filled on the first day, she said. The craftsmen paid $20 each for display space.

Robust sales could require expansion to other rooms to allow for more displays and to help disperse the crowd, said Woodward.

"For a good part of the day it is pretty packed in there and (the ballroom) is a pretty large room," said Woodward.

The arts and crafts sale has been sponsored by the UPC Arts Committee for "about 10 or 15 years," and if response continues to be strong, should continue for many more years, she said.

"It has gotten better and bigger every year and we expect to do well this year. The vendors keep coming back, so they must be doing pretty well, too," Woodward said. Fifteen artisans are on the waiting list to show their crafts at this year's sale.

The sale will be from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Thursday and 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Friday.

Lady Cats' guard Elyse Funk attempts to get around University of Minnesota guard Debbie Hilmerson during the first-half of Monday night's non-conference game in Ahearn Field House. K-State defeated the Golden Gophers 79-68 after a slow first half.

Lady Cats outlast sluggish opening to dump Gophers

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER
Sports Writer

Things did not go quite as Lady Cat basketball coach Matilda Mossman had planned Monday night, but she did get the desired result — a victory over the visiting Minnesota Golden Gophers.

It took a while for K-State to get things going at the outset. But the Lady Cats used a stingy full-court press and some clutch free throw shooting in the final minutes to hold off a late Minnesota charge and come away with a 79-68 win.

"Last year against them (Minnesota), we came out of the blocks real fast and got the early lead," Mossman said. "But tonight, they were the ones who were ready to play, and we came out a little sluggish."

A little sluggish indeed, as K-State found itself down early 11-6. The Golden Gophers were able to use their distinct height advantage to gain the early upperhand by lobbing the ball inside to their big people.

K-State's Sue Leiding battled back with a little inside game of her own as she scored 7 of the Lady Cats' next 11 points to give K-State the lead 17-14 midway through the first half.

Leiding, a 6-foot-2 senior center, said she was really surprised by how easy it was to score from inside against the much-taller Minnesota team.

"We talked about how difficult it would be to match up with their size, especially in the middle," said Leiding, who led the Lady Cats with 21 points. "I figured they would be more aggressive in the middle but they really weren't, and I was really shocked that the middle was so open.

"When the other girls came into the game, I told them to take it right to them because it was so open. We just plain outhustled them in the middle," she added.

Outhustle the Golden Gophers is exactly what K-State did when Mossman moved her team into a full-court trapping press which gave the Minnesota guards fits.

K-State's press was the main reason Minnesota turned the ball over 14 times in the first half, and the Lady Cats took advantage of the Golden Gophers' miscues in building a 43-33 lead at the half.

"We felt we could win the game in the backcourt by forcing them to make some turnovers with our press," Mossman said.

Minnesota's coach, Ellen Mosher Hanson, also said turnovers were the difference.

"We killed ourselves by not taking care of the ball," Hanson said. "They also had some turnovers, but ours seemed to come at more critical times."

Especially toward the end of the game, when Minnesota was made a charge at K-State, did the turnovers really hurt the Golden Gophers.

Minnesota had cut a once commanding 14 point K-State lead to a narrow 59-58 margin, with six minutes left in the game, when K-State point guard Susan Green took over. Green, a 5-8 senior, scored the Lady Cats' next 6 points as she led a Wildcat spurt which saw K-State outscore Minnesota 15-6 during the final minutes of the contest.

"I felt like I was being to tentative — well we all did a little — and I just decided during the timeout to do something by getting a basket, a steal, or anything to get us going," she said.

Green's spurt at the end gave her 18 points on the evening, while Tracey Bleczinski added 10. Bleczinski and Carlisa Thomas each pulled down nine rebounds for K-State.

Minnesota was led by guard Cindy Phillips who scored 17 points. Diane Kinney and Susie Piram added 14 and 13 points, respectively.

The victory was the Lady Cats' third of the year without a loss, and they will put that perfect 3-0 mark on the line when they travel to Ruston, La., to participate in the Louisiana Tech Classic Friday and Saturday.

Other teams in the two-day tournament are American University, Central Michigan and host Lousiana Tech.

K-State's opponent in the opening round is American which had a 20-7 record last season.

Louisiana Tech finished 27-5 last season and just missed their seventh consecutive trip to the final four. The Lady Techsters, No. 2 in Sports Illustrated's preseason poll, will face the Central Michigan Chippewas in the tourney's second game.

Hot outside shooting sparks 'Cats by Grand Canyon, 93-57

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

It didn't take long for K-State to put away another overmatched opponent at Ahearn Field House — six minutes to be exact.

By that time the Wildcats had jumped out to a 17-2 lead en route to a 93-57 romp Monday night over Grand Canyon (Ariz.).

The red-hot outside shooting of junior-college transfers William Scott and Mitch Richmond sparked the first-half surge. Scott and Richmond combined for 11 three-point field goals — seven in the opening period.

Richmond, who had six three-pointers, poured in 29 points for the game. Scott added 19 for the 'Cats who had five players in double figures for the second straight game. As a team, the Wildcats made good on 12-of-21 attempts from beyond the three-point circle.

"My teammates did a good job of getting the ball to me tonight," Scott said. "The defense laid off tonight and left me the shot, so I just took them and they were falling."

Richmond, who gave himself a "D" for his performance after struggling in the season opener, said he was more comfortable in his second major-college game and graded himself an "A".

"I felt real comfortable tonight. I was more into it. I knew how the crowd was, and I knew they were on my side tonight," said Richmond, who has quickly established himself as a favorite of the Ahearn faithful.

After the initial outburst, the Wildcats gradually extended their lead to 31-6 a little past the halfway mark in the first half before the Antelopes were able to regroup and mount a brief charge of their own. But the 'Cats held a comfortable lead at the half, 47-26.

K-State gradually lengthened the lead in the final period which allowed head coach Lon Kruger to empty his bench toward the end of the contest.

Grand Canyon, now 2-5, was led by Bob Henige who tossed in 13. Three other Antelopes scored in double figures.

While not overly pleased with his team's performance, Kruger did point out several bright spots after the game.

"We did some things better tonight," he said. "Ron Meyer stepped in a got a few rebounds, and Mitch (Richmond) and Will (Scott) shot the ball awfully well."

Meyer led the team in rebounds with 12 and chipped in 10 points.

Kruger also said he was not surprised at his team's success from long range. He said three-point field goals were not a specific strategy which he had installed for this particular game.

"They chose to play the percentages and stayed back a little tighter (on defense) which leaves you open out beyond the three-point line," he said.

After the game, Richmond and Scott each said they were unaware of the location of the three-point line when they shot the ball.

"I had no idea they were three-pointers," Scott said.

"I like the rule, but I feel it's a little bit too close," he added.

After two relatively easy wins the Wildcats, 2-0, should receive their first real test of the young season Thursday night when they travel to Lubbock, Texas, to take on the Texas Tech Red Raiders.

Texas Tech is led by key returners Sean Gay, Dewayne Chism, Greg Crowe and Mike Nelson. The Red Raiders play tonight in Lexington against the University of Kentucky before hosting K-State in the 8,174-seat Lubbock Municipal Coliseum.

Former K-State football coach now tutors Bears

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

When former Wildcat linebacker coach Dave McGinnis was dismissed from K-State's football coaching staff last season along with head Coach Jim Dickey, he wanted to find a challenging new job.

He did.

McGinnis is now linebacker coach for the reigning world-champion National Football League Chicago Bears. The Bears are currently 11-2 and have repeated as champions in the Central Division of the National Football Conference.

"This is probably the best job in football right now. It really is," McGinnis said.

McGinnis, 35, joined the Bears' coaching staff in February, about three weeks after they won the Super Bowl. Vince Tobin, a friend from McGinnis' coaching days at the University of Missouri, works for the Bears and referred McGinnis to head coach Mike Ditka.

Although moving from the Wildcats to the Bears might sound like a drastic change, McGinnis said his duties haven't changed enormously. However, professional football is not like college football, he said.

McGinnis coached at K-State for four years, following previous coaching stints at Texas Christian University, Missouri and Indiana State University.

"The NFL is a lot different than college football because there's more pressure. You're in the national eye, and it's the top of the profession. The preparation doesn't change, but you're working with the players' lives," McGinnis said. "It's a national phenomenon every Sunday.

"It's truly a business. What (the players) want is how much knowledge they can get from you. The more knowledge they get from you, the better they'll do and the more chance they have to win on Sunday. The more they win, the more they can get for their salaries and the more offers they can get for endorsements," he added.

And like other businessmen, McGinnis keeps a busy schedule.

McGinnis and other Chicago coaches arrive at the stadium every weekday around 6 a.m. They discuss strategies and review tapes until about 9 a.m. when the players come in. Coaches and players then meet for approximately three hours before breaking for lunch.

After lunch, the team practices until 6 p.m. Then the coaches get together to continue their discussion of game plans, which means McGinnis usually doesn't get home before 9 p.m.

This schedule makes for a long week, but McGinnis said he isn't spending any more time working for the Bears than he did for the Wildcats.

'The NFL is a lot different than college football because there's more pressure.'

— Dave McGinnis

"In college football, you have to work with the players on their game, but you also have to make sure they are developing in their academic lives and in their social lives. Here it's a business — we spend all our time working on the game," McGinnis said.

Being associated with the Bears has thrust McGinnis into the spotlight, he said. Not only are the Bears famous on the football field, but several are becoming media personalities as well.

"All of the players on the Bears are popular because we are the national champions. We have a lot of great players and characters," McGinnis said.

"At the same time, these people are here because they're the top professionals in their business," he said. "It's great being around them. From what you read about them in the newspapers you really don't know the real Jim McMahon, the real Mike Singletary, the real Walter Perry."

McGinnis said he has a great deal of respect for Ditka. Ditka is at the stadium at 5:30 a.m., Monday through Friday, and stays until at least 9 p.m. every night.

"Mike Ditka is one of the most intense competitors I've ever been around," McGinnis said. "After winning the Super Bowl last season his intent was to establish the Bears like the (Pittsburgh) Steelers were in the '70s and the (Green Bay) Packers were in the '60s. He wants to make the Bears the measuring stick of the '80s. He went to training this year with that attitude.

"He's amazing to watch; he really is. Before his career's over with, he'll probably go down as one of the great coaches in history, not only as a great coach, but as a motivator and an innovator," he said.

Being associated with the Bears has changed McGinnis' lifestyle, but he said it hasn't changed him. However, he said his job has affected people's attitudes toward him.

"It's funny sometimes how people's perceptions change because of where you are," McGinnis said.

For example, McGinnis has many new future prospects as a result of his job with the Bears. He said he could eventually advance in the NFL as a coordinator, and he has been offered a head-coaching position on the collegiate level.

Before joining the Bears' staff, McGinnis coached college players for 14 years. If he had stayed in college football, he said it would probably take another seven or eight years to advance as far as he has in the last 10 months.

"With the continued success we continue to have here — we're the No. 1 defensive team in the nation — or anytime you're associated with success, it will help your prospects," McGinnis said.

Kansas slips past Jaguars

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Forward Danny Manning scored 21 points and grabbed 11 rebounds to lead No. 6 Kansas to an 87-69 victory over Southern University Monday night in a non-conference college basketball game.

Cedric Hunter and Mark Randall added 15 points each for the Jayhawks, 2-0. Randall also grabbed 10 rebounds.

The Jaguars, 1-2, were led by Dervynn Johnson with 17 points and Craig Pollard with 11.

The Jayhawks raced to a 6-0 lead on field goals by Mark Turgeon and Manning, who got in foul trouble in the first half and played only 26 minutes.

The Jayhawks fell behind 21-20 with 9:11 left in the half, tied the game 24-24 and then took the lead for good at 28-26 on a layup by Robert Coyne with 5:53 to go.

making a public visit to the Widow King," Buchanan wrote.

He characterized King as "one of the most divisive men in contemporary history" and:

"Initially, the visit would get an excellent press but...it would outrage many, many people who believe Dr. King was a fraud and a demagogue, and perhaps worse," the memo said. "It does not seem to be in the interests of national unity for the president to lend his national prestige to the argument that this divisive figure is a modern saint."

There had been considerable discussion in the White House about how Nixon was to observe the assassination anniversary, which was April 4, 1969. A March 31 staff discussion, in which Buchanan took part, had recommended that Nixon stop in Atlanta on a trip from Abilene, Tex., to Key Biscayne, Fla., and have a private meeting with King's widow.

Neither action was followed. Instead, Nixon sent Robert Finch, then secretary of Health Education and Welfare, to deliver personal condolences to Mrs. King.

Throughout his administration, Nixon's aides often were careful about how the president was portrayed with blacks.

On July 20, 1971, Jeb Stuart Magruder, then with the Committee to Re-elect the President, suggested that the president make plans to attend the baseball game when Oakland A's pitcher Vida Blue would go for his 30th victory.

"As you know, of course, he is black," Magruder said in a memo to Dwight Chapin, the appointments secretary. "The president's attendance...could strike a very positive note, particularly among young blacks."

Blue finished the season without winning 30 games and it was unclear Magruder's suggestion would have been followed if he had gone for a 30th victory.

surance agent, told his fellow House Republicans after they had nominated him to succeed Hayden as speaker.

"It's an awesome responsibility. I'm humble, but I accept the challenge. It will be a great challenge, particularly with the finances of our state the way they are.

"But it will be great working with a Republican governor. I know we will all do what we can for the great state of Kansas."

Barkis also noted the change in party leadership in the governor's office from Democrat John Carlin to Republican Hayden.

"With a Republican in the governor's chair, we Democrats have a responsibility to the people of this state to provide a balance," Barkis told the caucus of the Democrats, who face a 74-51 disadvantage in seats in the House.

Barkis said if Hayden's goals as governor reflect his record as speaker, people should expect less emphasis on school funding, farmers' troubles, medical assistance and treatment for the mentally handicapped.

"We Democrats must speak out when we see this Republican government heading in these directions," said Barkis, who vowed his party would be "a force to be reckoned with" in state government.

Braden became part of the GOP leadership when Wendell Lady was speaker before Hayden. Lady made him chairman of the House Assessment and Taxation and Hayden was Ways and Means Committee chairman.

Braden became majority leader of the House two years ago when Joe Hoagland of Overland Park did not seek re-election and relinquished the post.

System to shed light during blackouts

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

In the case of a total electrical blackout, the residents of Ford, Haymaker and Moore halls would be without emergency lighting. Action is being taken to install a battery-operated system, however.

Battery-operated emergency lighting systems are not in operation at Ford, Haymaker or Moore halls, but separate electrical circuit emergency lighting is provided,

According to H. Gene Wiley, maintenence superintendent for the Department of Housing, the only way the three buildings would be without light was in case of a catastrophe.

"If all electricity went off, to the big transformer sitting outside of Derby, then the emergency lighting would not come on in Ford, Moore or Haymaker," Wiley said.

The transformer would provide lighting if electricity in any individual hall was out, because the emergency lighting is on a separate circuit than the standard lighting, Wiley said.

West Hall and Derby Food Center are the only two buildings in Derby Complex with battery-operated emergency lighting systems, but Wiley said action is being taken to remedy the lack of the systems in Ford, Haymaker and Moore — the other three buildings in the complex.

"A man was here from the State Architectural Division, and we went over and looked to see where we were going to put a generator outside of Derby that would automatically come on if there was catastrophe and for some reason that big transformer went out," Wiley said.

"This generator would take over immediately and provide emergency lighting to Ford, Moore and Haymaker," he said.

Before the emergency generator was approved for purchase, Bill Graff, junior in agricultural economics and president of Haymaker, was concerned enough about the lack of emergency to write a letter to the Collegian.

Before the letter was published, correction of the situation was in the planning.

"When I wrote it, they still hadn't approved it, but now it's gone through and everything is on the way," Graff said.

"I think it's a good idea to get the buildings updated and improving the safety of them, but I still think the housing department should let the residents of these halls know that in a certain type of campuswide blackout these buildings wouldn't have any emergency lighting," he said.

Faiths view day differently

Justin Rosenberg completes the lighting of the Menorah, a tradition of the Jewish celebration of Hanukkah.

By CHRISTINE DOLL
Collegian Reporter

Christmas is celebrated by some because it is the birthday of Christ, whom they believe is the son of God. Others celebrate to remember Christ, whom they believe was a prophet. Others do not celebrate in the traditional ways because they choose to remember Christ in a different way.

Several religions — Christian and non-Christian — do not observe Christmas in the same manner or for the same reasons as most Americans.

The Jehovah's Witnesses do not exchange gifts, decorate their homes or sing traditional songs for Christmas, said Robert Bleven, a church elder. Instead, they get together and reflect on the life and teachings of Jesus.

"Neither Jesus nor the Bible said anything about celebrating his birthday, but he did about his death," Bleven said.

He said Dec. 25 had pagan origins. It was the day the Romans worshipped the sun. It was agreed upon to be the birthday of Christ later in history.

Bleven said Christmas was meant to be a time to remember Christ. However, he lamented that the holiday now signifies — at least in part — other more selfish meanings.

"The sad part of it is commercialism has taken over, and it's been that way for at least 50 years."

Moslems do not observe Christmas with decorations or presents, either.

Samy Aly, research associate in physics, is Moslem. He said Moslems remember Christ as "pious."

"We love him (but) do not think of him as divine," Aly said.

He said Moslems do not exchange gifts because it is not necessary.

"We try to let our children understand that Jesus is a great and just man," he said. "But it is not necessary to buy gifts to remember him in our hearts."

Aly said celebrating the season by going to party after party and drinking a lot of alcohol is forgetting the man.

"We try to remember the good things about him, remember what he taught and the great things he did, and we try to imitate him," he said.

The Baha'i and Buddhist faiths are not Christian, but they celebrate the holiday in traditional Christian ways.

"There is nothing in Buddhism that prohibites you from celebrating Christmas or your grandfather's birthday," said Leon Rappoport, former adviser of the Buddhist Student Association and professor in psychology.

'We try to let our children understand that Jesus is a great and just man. But it is not necessary to buy gifts to remember him in our hearts.'
— Samy Aly

He said Buddhists believe Jesus was not God, but he was a "brilliant teacher of ethics, religion and metaphysics." This is one on the reasons the faith celebrates.

The other is because Christmas is an cultural tradition, he said.

"It is a very important cultural process to the United States and the culture," Rappoport said. "They (his children) were expecting presents, so we gave them presents. They were expecting a tree, so we put up a tree."

Houchang Khatamian, professor in horticulture, practices the Baha'i faith. Christmas is not observed as a holy day by the religion, although it believes Jesus was a prophet. He said the individual members are allowed to choose how they celebrate.

"I like to put up a tree, but it is not an in-depth thing," he said. "I guess it's like a lot of people — forgetting about the spirit of what it is all about."

Snow flurries remain part of the traditional outdoor scene during the Christmas season. However, the traditional indoor scene of family and friends gathered around the Christmas tree may be changing.

Reflecting the electronic evolution, the television set is beginning to replace the traditional Christmas tree. Family and friends are getting together during the holidays to watch a good video for entertainment.

Pam Read, assistant manager of National Video, 1123 Westloop Place, said the night before Christmas in video rental centers has the appearance of "The Grinch that Stole Christmas." Most shelves are barren of all video tapes.

"On Christmas Eve our store is just bare," Read said. "Toward the end, people start checking out anything and everything. They are looking for something to do over the holidays, so they rent videos."

Read also said the week after Christmas is one of the busiest weeks of the year. She said many videos are released to coincide with the holiday season. This year, some of the new video releases are, "Trip to Bountiful," "Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom," and "Violets are Blue."

Several videos with Christmas themes will also be available, including "One Magic Christmas" and "The Magic Christmas Tree," Read said.

Becki Johnson, manager of The Video Exchange, 706 N. 11th St., said many religious videos are rented during the Christmas holiday season. These include such classics as "The Greatest Story Ever Told" and "The Ten Commandments."

She said movies for children, such as "Yes, Virginia, There Is A Santa Claus" and "The Santa Claus Movie," are popular choices at this time.

"Our business really picks up during holiday seasons, especially Thanksgiving and Christmas. People have more time off and the weather is colder, so there isn't a whole lot for people to do," Johnson said.

Those who want to remain a bit more traditional, yet still wish to see a good movie, often bundle up for the trip to the local movie theater.

Bob Howard, city manager of Commonwealth Theatres, said audience attendance at Commonwealth Theatres can almost double during the holiday season.

"Whether the attendence doubles depends on what picture is playing at which theater. It may not have that much affect on one particular theater. However, the overall effect is what counts."

Traditional gifts increase retail income

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

Ah, the romance of Christmas.

Ribbons, tinsel, scented candles and soft music — each adds a special touch to the holidays.

Behind the scenes, however, the "special touch" means more to merchants who deal in Christmas goodies.

It means money.

On the average, most retail businesses pull in 20 percent to 25 percent of their total sales volume in the last eight weeks of the year. In fact, in December 1985 alone, sales increased 17.5 percent over the previous month, according to statistics published in U.S. Department of Commerce Current Business Reports.

Of course, this is largely due to the hustling and bustling Christmas shopper.

Bill Patzell, owner of Manhattan Floral Co., 630 Poyntz Ave., estimates that his business is in line with that figure, although most sales do not occur until mid-December.

"Extremely cold weather hurts sales noticeably," Patzell said. "You always have to keep adjusting the figure, because it is never concrete, or the same, from year to year."

Perhaps one reason for the high sales during the holiday season is that the holiday is wrapped in tradition. Things that may seem
